(2) As used in such a statute, "willful" means demanding and receiving fees without reasonable grounds to believe such charge to be lawful and not merely officer's intentional collection thereof.

Tex.—Lewis v. State, 64 S.W.2d 972, 124 Tex.Cr. 582.

is not taken for the officer's own use may be of evidential value as showing the absence of intent,⁴⁹ as may be the fact that the aggregate of the officer's fees is less than the total amount which he has a right to demand,⁵⁰ or that the payment was voluntary;⁵¹ and where the officer accepts a cash bond for the appearance of a person arrested and released by him, he is not guilty of extortion.⁵² So, a custom or usage in the community as to the fees demanded may be shown as contradicting a corrupt intent,⁵³ although, as appears infra § 8, such custom will not in itself constitute a defense.

While a contrary rule prevails in some jurisdictions,⁵⁴ it is generally held that notwithstanding the officer has acted in good faith and under mistake or ignorance of the law he cannot on that account be held free from a criminal intent,⁵⁵ except, it has been held, where the law is not settled or is obscure,⁵⁶ or where the officer has acted after the advice of, and consultation with, counsel,⁵⁷ although it has also been held to be immaterial that accused acted on the advice of counsel where the law was clear and settled.⁵⁸ However, an officer cannot be convicted for collecting an unlawful fee where he did so by mistake of fact, inadvertence, or miscalculation.⁵⁹

Under statutes making the act criminal without regard to specific intent, an honest belief on the part of the officer that he was entitled to the fee will not protect him.⁶⁰

§ 4. — Duress or Exaction

The taking, to constitute extortion, need not be by duress.

The taking, in order to constitute extortion, need not be under circumstances amounting to actual duress.⁶¹ The word "exact," as used in a statute prohibiting officers from exacting unauthorized compensation is not synonymous with the word "demand."⁶²

§ 5. — Color of Office or Right

The oppressive use of official position is the essence of extortion, and to constitute extortion the taking by the officer must be in his official capacity and by color of his office; that is, the person paying must have been yielding to official authority.

The oppressive use of official position is the essence of the offense of extortion.^{62.50} Thus, to constitute extortion the taking must be by the officer in his official capacity,⁶³ and by color of his office,⁶⁴ and activity beyond the scope of his em-

Money not due for performing duties

The element of "color of office" in crime of extortion means that the officer must have taken money not due him for the performance of his official duties.

ployment is not dealt with.^{64.5} This does not necessarily imply that the taking must be for an act or service which the officer is under a duty or has a discretionary power to perform;⁶⁵ it does imply, however, an exercise of official power possessed, or pretended to be possessed, by the officer as distinguished from an act which could have been performed by any other person.⁶⁶

In other words, the person paying must have been yielding to official authority,⁶⁷ and not acting voluntarily,⁶⁸ although it has also been held that consent, induced under color of official right, is one of the elements of the offense.⁶⁹ It has been held, however, that if a public officer could not lawfully act in his private capacity, it is no defense to a prosecution by indictment that money was taken for services so rendered.⁷⁰

Where charges for official services and services rendered by the officer in his individual capacity are lumped, but in such a way that a separation can be made, the charge for individual services is not thereby converted into a criminal demand for a gratuity for doing an official act.⁷¹ Under a statute defining extortion as the obtaining by an officer, under color of his office, of money or other things of value which are not due him, the offense may be committed without regard to whether he is executing or pretending to execute a legal paper, or although he exacts money on a promise not to execute process.⁷² Under a statute punishing the demand of a greater fee than is allowed by statute, it has been held that it is not extortion to demand fees of a person who is not liable to pay them.⁷³

§ 6. — Money or Thing of Value Extorted

To constitute extortion, money or some other thing of value must have been received.

To constitute extortion at common law, there must be the receipt of money or some other thing of value.⁷⁴ The obtaining of a mere promise or agreement to pay which is unenforceable because of its illegality, see Contracts § 220, will not, in the absence of payment, support an indictment for extortion;⁷⁵ but on its payment to the officer the offense of extortion would seem to be made out.⁷⁶ However, a check or writing by which a claim against a bank or the drawer could have been made has a real value within the meaning of the law.⁷⁷

A statute penalizing an officer's exaction or acceptance of unauthorized compensation is violated if the officer demands the money and there is a meeting of the minds on the part of the officer and the party from whom the money is exacted.⁷⁸

It is immaterial whether the person of whom the unlawful fee is demanded pays it or whether he procures another to pay it on his behalf.⁷⁹ Under a statute so providing, it is immaterial whether the fee was collected by defendant for himself or for another.⁸⁰

§ 7. Attempts

Whether an act constitutes attempted extortion depends on the officer's intent, and not on the result of his act.

Whether a particular act constitutes an attempt to commit extortion depends on the mind and intent of the officer, and not on the result of his act,⁸¹ and a demand for money by an officer is the overt act which constitutes the attempt.^{81.5} If, as a result of a demand, payment is actually made to an officer, the intended crime of extortion is committed and the attempt is merged in the completed crime; but if no payment is made and demand for payment is repeated, the officer is guilty of a second and separate attempt to extort.^{81.10}

Where an officer's demand for payment of money does not purport to be a claim for fees, but is rather a claim pursuant to contract, he is not guilty of an attempt to collect illegal fees.⁸² An attempt to exact fees after having received them from another is not extortion.⁸³

§ 8. Defenses

Various matters, such as custom, nonliability under special statute, or unconstitutionality of the statute, may or may not constitute defenses to a charge of extortion, in accordance with whether or not they show the absence of an element of the offense.

A custom or usage of demanding fees of the amount or nature demanded by the officer will not in itself constitute a defense,⁸⁴ although, as appears in § 3 supra, it may evidence an absence of the necessary intent. Whether ignorance or mistake of fact or law may constitute a defense because of lack of the necessary intent is also considered supra § 3.

In jurisdictions where it is held that the statute does not abrogate the common law, nonliability under the statute is no defense to an indictment at common law,⁸⁵ although it constitutes a defense to an indictment based on a statute;⁸⁶ and it is no defense to a prosecution against an officer for extortion that certain preliminary steps necessary in civil actions had not been taken.⁸⁷

The unconstitutionality of the statute on which the prosecution is founded is a defense.⁸⁸ Under a general statutory saving clause applicable to all repealing acts, the repeal of the statute relating to extortion is not a defense to a prosecution under it, pending at the time of the repeal, unless the contrary is expressly provided in the repealing act.⁸⁹

§ 9. Persons Liable

At common law and under statutes conforming thereto, only an officer can commit extortion, although, except under statutes designating specific officers, any person occupying an official or quasi-official position, or any officer, whether de facto or de jure, can be guilty of the crime. An officer is not indictable for extortion by his agent unless express authority is shown; but two or more persons may be jointly responsible.

At common law and under statutory definitions of the offense conforming thereto, the crime of extortion can be committed only by an officer.⁹⁰ In general, it may be said that any officer, whether he is a federal, state, municipal, or judicial officer, and every person occupying an official or quasi-official position, may be guilty of this offense;⁹¹ and it is immaterial that the accused is an officer from another state at the time of the alleged extortion.^{91.5} One may be guilty of extortion where he occupies an official or quasi-official position, although he is compensated through private sources.⁹²

At any rate a legally existing office giving to the incumbent an official character, either de facto or de jure, is essential.⁹³ The facts that the office is of recent origin, and that no precedent can be found of the conviction of such an officer of the offense of extortion, are not conclusive as against liability.⁹⁴

Statutory provisions. Where the statute defining the offense restricts its application to specific officers, the accused must fall within the statutory designation.⁹⁵ In those jurisdictions in which common-law offenses are not abrogated, see Criminal Law § 20, an officer who does not fall within the terms of a statute relating to specific officers may nevertheless be guilty of extortion at common law.⁹⁶ Under some statutes the offense can be committed only by an officer authorized to charge fees.⁹⁷

A statute designating the offense of extortion by officers does not include offenders specifically designated in other statutes.⁹⁸ Other agencies rendering a public service and receiving compensation therefor have been subjected by statutes to restrictions and liabilities similar to those imposed on public officers.⁹⁹

Whether an officer's statutory liability for extortion under a statute imposing a penalty affects his criminal liability is considered infra § 15 a.

De facto or de jure officers. One is a public officer within the meaning of the law of extortion who exercises the powers generally of the office.¹ The offense may be committed by a de facto officer² and defendant cannot set up the irregularity of his appointment³ or his failure to take the oath of office.⁴

Liability of officer or agent. A public officer is not subject to indictment for extortion practiced by his official agent,⁵ except if express authority or direction is shown; that is, if an officer authorizes another to receive property under such circumstances as would constitute extortion if such receiving had been done by the officer himself, then both such officer and such other person would be guilty of extortion.⁶ Thus, the fact that the defendant may

Joint responsibility. Two or more persons may be jointly indicted and convicted of extortion when they act together and concur in the demand.⁷

Presence of accused. A person charged with extortion need not have been present when each and every act was committed, and he may be shown to have advised or procured its commission.^{7.5}

§ 10. Indictment or Information

An indictment or information for extortion must charge the essential elements of the offense, in accordance with the general rules governing indictments or informations.

Under the general rules applicable to indictments and informations, an indictment or information for extortion must charge the essential elements of the offense,⁸ in the form of facts and not of conclusions.⁹ It must contain a definite description of the offense charged and a statement of the facts in the case at bar which constitute it,¹⁰ with such certainty as to be pleadable in bar of another prosecution.¹¹

Thus, the substance of the threats allegedly made may properly be set forth in some detail.^{11.5}

Where the offense is designated by statute, an indictment or information which charges the offense in the language of the statute is sufficient.¹² It is not necessary to allege the section of the statute violated.¹³

In a proper case unnecessary words in the indictment may be disregarded.¹⁴

The technical charging words in an indictment for extortion at common law were "extort,"¹⁵ or "extorsively,"¹⁶ and "by color of office."¹⁷

Allegations as to official capacity. The official capacity in which defendant acted must be alleged,¹⁸ as must the authority to charge fees where made an element of the offense by statute.¹⁹ Where the statute requires it, an averment that the accused officer took the oath of office required by law becomes necessary.²⁰ where a statute is applicable by its terms to a specified class of public officers, facts must be alleged bringing defendant within the statutory limitations;²¹ but substantial ac-

Bribery, and not extortion, held charged

Okl.—Finley v. State, 181 P.2d 849, 84 Okl.Cr. 309.

Indictments or informations held sufficient

(1) Generally.

(2) To charge attempt.

N.J.—State v. Weleck, 91 A.2d 751, 10 N.J. 355.

Indictment for oppression held insufficient

Facts stated in count of indictment charging oppression that defendant police officer obtained specified sum from person driving automobile while intoxicated when arrested by threatening to report certain facts to bureau of motor vehicles, thereby causing him to fear loss of his operator's license, were insufficient to constitute crime of "oppression."

Position of employment

Indictment charging offense of using position of employment with United States to extort, substantially in words of statute, held sufficient. U.S.—U. S. v. Sutter, C.C.A.Ill., 160 F.2d 754.

14. Conformity with statute

Where the statute prohibits the "extorting" of compensation by officers and the indictment stated that the officer had "demanded and exacted" unlawful compensation, the word "demanded" may be disregarded for the purpose of disposing of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, Fla.—State ex rel. 21. Pa.—Commonwealth v. Brown, 23 Pa.Super. 470.

Allegations held insufficient

An information against city building inspector and commissioner cannot be upheld under statute providing for punishment of any state offi-

curacy, not technical accuracy, is required in these averments.²²

Allegations as to color of office. An allegation that fees were taken "by color of office" is necessary.²³ This allegation must not be merely in the words "by color of office" without more, but should show further by color of what office the extortionate act was committed,²⁴ and by express terms, not by implication from the averment of defendant's official capacity.²⁵ It is not necessary, in charging the offense at common law, to allege that defendant took the money "as fees," or "to his own use," it being sufficient to allege that he extorted it by color of office.²⁶ Under statutory requirements, it has been held necessary to allege that the sum extorted was demanded²⁷ as a fee for some official duty.²⁸

Allegations as to nature of services. An allegation of the services for which fees were charged is necessary,²⁹ and the offense, if statutory, must be charged in terms bringing the rendition of the services within the statutory definition.³⁰ The allegation must be made with sufficient certainty to enable the court to conclude from facts stated whether or not the compensation received was other than that authorized or permitted by law.³¹

Allegation of fee or reward due accused. An indictment for extortion under a statute declaring any officer taking a fee or reward not allowed by law for doing his office guilty of a misdemeanor need not set forth the fact that no fee or reward was due accused.^{31.5}

Allegations as to excessiveness or illegality of charge. It is not sufficient to allege generally that defendant took a certain sum, or that he took more than was due, but an allegation should be made of what he ought to have taken and what was the excess.³² However, the amount of the legal charge need not be averred where fixed by law and not varying according to circumstances.³³ Where the fee fixed by law is not certain and unchangeable by circumstances, it is necessary to allege not merely the amount taken, but also the facts by which its legality can be ascertained.³⁴

Where the taking of illegal fees is for services for which no statutory allowance is made, the fact that no statutory allowance is made must be alleged.³⁵ Where the amount taken is an aggregate of charges for several items of service, an allegation of the items of service and of the aggregate amount taken, but omitting the items of illegal fees taken, would seem to be open to the objection that it does not inform accused as to what items were overcharges and what he must prepare himself to meet.³⁶

Allegations as to taking of money or thing of value. The indictment must allege that accused actually received something of value,³⁷ and must allege that the money or property was obtained with the consent of the complaining witness.³⁸ If a statute specifies the thing forbidden to be taken, the indictment must specify the particular thing taken;³⁹ and the amount taken must be alleged specifically.⁴⁰

Allegation held insufficient

An indictment, alleging a conspiracy and confederation on part of city commissioner as member of committee appointed to compromise dispute with power company to exact unauthorized compensation from president of power company in consideration for adjustment of differences between city and power company on terms satisfactory to power company, was insufficient to charge a crime under statute penalizing officer's acceptance or exaction of unauthorized compensation for performance or nonperformance of duty as against attack on proceeding for writ of habeas corpus.

Allegations as to time and place of extortionate act. The time and place of the extortionate act are material averments in an indictment and must be specifically alleged.⁴² The words "then and there", without further allegation of time and place, are not sufficient.⁴³

Allegations as to intent. An indictment at common law or under a statute adopting the common-law rule with reference to intent must allege a corrupt purpose.⁴⁴ The words "extort" and "extorsively" are descriptive of the crime and are generally used to charge the corrupt purpose in the approved precedents of common-law indictments for extortion.⁴⁵ The word "knowingly," when employed in the statute, should be used in an indictment on the statute,⁴⁶ although it need not be employed in a common-law indictment.⁴⁷ The word "willfully" has been held to be not indispensable.⁴⁸

§ 11. — Issues, Proof, and Variance

General rules governing matters to be proved, and variance between the indictment and proof, in criminal prosecutions, are applicable to prosecutions for extortion.

General rules governing matters to be proved in criminal prosecutions, as discussed in Indictments and Informations §§ 244-252, are applicable to prosecutions for extortion.⁴⁹

Similarly, general rules as to variance between an indictment and the proof, see Indictments and Informations, §§ 254-270, are applicable to prosecutions for extortion.⁵⁰ Thus, a variance between allegation and proof as to material facts or circumstances surrounding the extortionate act is fatal;⁵¹ but a variance as to an immaterial fact is not fatal.⁵² Accordingly it has been held to be fatal that there is a variance between an indictment charging extortion in the terms of the statute and proof of an offense not within its terms,⁵³ or between the allegation and the proof as to official capacity of defendant;⁵⁴ and it has been held that if, because of the unconstitutionality of the statute creating the office alleged to be held by defendant, it appears in the proof that there is no such office in existence, the variance is fatal, even though the finding of the indictment antedates the decision declaring the statute unconstitutional.⁵⁵

A variance between allegation and proof as to the amount of money taken is not material;⁵⁶ but it has been held that a variance between allegation and proof as to the character of the money taken,⁵⁷ or as to the purpose for which it is taken,⁵⁸ is material and fatal. Proof that extortionate fees were taken from a person other than the person alleged to be the party injured will not support a conviction;⁵⁹ but an indictment alleging that money was extorted from one person is well supported by evidence that, when the extortionate demand was made on such person, he obtained the money from another, in defendant's presence, and then handed it to defendant.⁶⁰

Rules governing the presumptions and burden of proof, the admissibility of evidence, and the weight and sufficiency of evidence in criminal prosecutions generally are applicable to prosecutions for extortion.

In accordance with the rules governing the burden of proof and presumptions in criminal prosecutions generally, see Criminal Law §§ 566-599, the burden is on the state to establish the guilt of accused;⁶¹ but the burden is on accused to adduce proof of his defense.⁶² However, matters of which judicial notice is taken need not be proved.⁶³

The presumption of knowledge of the law is applicable.⁶⁴ An officer's return of his official actions on process is presumed to be correct, but its truth is put directly in issue by an indictment for extortion, and the presumption may be overthrown by proof.⁶⁵ When an itemized bill is not rendered, but merely a single charge for services is made, the presumption is that it is made for the services at that time rendered, unless it otherwise appears in the evidence.⁶⁶

Admissibility. Under the rules applicable in criminal prosecutions generally, which are applicable in prosecutions for extortion,⁶⁷ various evidence offered in prosecutions for extortion has been held admissible⁶⁸ or inadmissible.⁶⁹

Applying these rules to the question of intent, matters offered in evidence which have been held competent and material, and therefore admissible, include threats,⁷⁰ the officer's experience and acquaintance with his duties,⁷¹ a prior indictment against accused for a like offense,⁷² although the effect of such an indictment should be limited by the court to its bearing on this issue only,⁷³ the purpose for which payment was intended,⁷⁴ and other matters.⁷⁵

Exclusion held error

In prosecution for collection of illegal fees, exclusion of testimony that sheriff was at place with subpoena for witness not served was held error, although such testimony would not entitle sheriff to fee, where it tended to show good faith in charging for making such trip.

On the other hand, items offered in evidence which have been held immaterial include evidence of a custom to collect fees or fines in a particular manner⁷⁶ or of previous acts by accused of a similar nature,⁷⁷ that accused acted on advice of counsel,⁷⁸ and other items of evidence.⁷⁹

Weight and sufficiency. Rules applicable to criminal prosecutions generally as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence are applicable to prosecutions for extortion.⁸⁰

§ 13. Trial and Review

Rules governing trials in criminal prosecutions generally have been applied to prosecutions for extortion, as with regard to the province of the court and the jury, and the necessity and sufficiency of instructions. General rules governing review in criminal proceedings have likewise been applied.

Under the rules governing trials in criminal cases generally, it is ordinarily held that it is for the jury to determine the character of the transaction⁸¹ and the intent of accused.⁸² The nature of the powers determining the official capacity of accused is a question partly of law and partly of fact.⁸³ Where the evidence shows that no money has been paid to defendant but merely a note or due bill which has not been paid, it has been held that a direction of a verdict for defendant is correct.⁸⁴

Instructions. In accordance with the rules governing instructions in criminal trials generally, the court should properly instruct the jury with regard to the issues in the case.⁸⁵ Common words, used in the statute in their ordinary sense, need not be defined to the jury,⁸⁶ but, where it is necessary, words in the statute should be defined.⁸⁷ Where a court allowance is a condition precedent to the legality of a charge for official services, an instruction based on the theory that its illegality also depends on a court's finding of its excessiveness has been held to be erroneous.⁸⁸

When the legality of compensation for services rendered by an officer in his individual capacity is in issue, instructions should state the distinction be-

Where a corrupt intent is an essential element of the offense, see supra § 3, the instructions should state, in words that will meet the statutory requirements,⁹¹ that such intent must be established.⁹² If such words are used, it is not necessary for the court to use other phrasing requested by the parties, even though the requested instruction also may conform to statutory requirements.⁹³ Where necessary, words in the statute describing the nature of the intent required must be defined.⁹⁴

Review. Rules governing the review of proceedings in criminal prosecutions generally have been applied to the review of prosecutions for extortion.⁹⁵

§ 14. Sentence and Punishment

At common law and under some statutes, extortion is punishable by fine, imprisonment, and removal from office.

Extortion was punished at common law by fine and imprisonment, and also by removal from office.⁹⁶

and under statutes to that effect the same punishments may be imposed.⁹⁷ Where the penalty for the offense is provided for by statute, a greater penalty cannot be imposed, even though the prosecution was based on common-law counts which charged only attempted extortion.⁹⁸

§ 15. Penalties and Actions Therefor

- a. In general
- b. Acts imposing liability
- c. Defenses
- d. Persons entitled to enforce
- e. Persons liable
- f. Actions to enforce

a. In General

Under statutes so providing, an officer guilty of extortion may be liable to the aggrieved party for a penalty. Such statutes are strictly construed, and do not render the surety on the officer's bond liable for the penalty. Ordinarily, liability for the penalty does not affect, and is not affected by, criminal liability.

Under statutes to that effect in many jurisdictions, an officer guilty of extortion is liable to the aggrieved party in a civil action for a penalty.⁹⁹ These statutes are generally regarded as penal in their nature,¹ and subject to a strict construction.² The primary object of such legislation is to prevent the exaction of illegal fees by public officers.³ In some jurisdictions, questions have arisen concerning the constitutionality of these statutes, but they have been uniformly upheld.⁴

Liability of sureties on officer's bond. Sureties on the official bond of a public officer cannot be subjected to the penalty incurred by the officer's extortionate act, in the absence of provisions in the statute and the bond creating such liability.⁵ Such liability is never extended by implication.⁶

Criminal liability as affected by, or affecting, liability for penalty. Notwithstanding a statute imposing a penalty, a common-law remedy by indictment is ordinarily held to remain,⁷ except where the statute imposing the penalty provides that no other penalty shall be inflicted.⁸ Similarly, a statute providing a penalty for extortion in demanding and receiving illegal fees is not repealed or suspended, by implication, by a statute imposing a fine on conviction for the misdemeanor.⁹ An officer may be guilty of extortion and liable to indictment at common law, although not subject to the penalty.¹⁰

b. Acts Imposing Liability

- (1) In general
- (2) Duress or compulsion
- (3) Nature of fees taken
- (4) Intent

(1) In General

It is generally essential to liability for the penalty that the extorsive act have been done under color of office or official right. It is immaterial that the fees were not paid directly to the officer.

As in the case of criminal prosecutions, see supra § 5, it is, as a general rule, regarded as an essential to the liability for the statutory penalty that the act constituting the alleged extortion have been done under color of office or official right.¹¹ The sum alleged to have been extorted must have been demanded as a fee for some official duty,¹² and must have been demanded of a person liable therefor;¹³ fees voluntarily paid by a person not liable, although improperly and unjustly taken, are not obtained by color of office.¹⁴

While it has been held that in order to subject an officer to the statutory penalty for taking illegal fees it must appear that he was an officer at the time of taking, charging, or demanding them,¹⁵ and that a penalty cannot be imposed against one who takes fees for services rendered while he is in office after his office has expired,¹⁶ there is also authority to the contrary.¹⁷

To whom payment made. It is immaterial that the fees were not paid directly to the officer, where he subsequently receives the money.¹⁸

(2) Duress or Compulsion

It is generally essential to liability for the statutory penalty that the payment be involuntary.

An action for a penalty cannot, as a rule, be maintained where the payment was voluntary on the part of plaintiff,¹⁹ although it has been held that the voluntary character of the payment is immaterial when the penalty is imposed on any officer "who shall receive" any fee not specifically provided for by law.²⁰ Where the other elements of the offense have been proved, the payment, although made without protest, is generally held to be under constraint, and voluntary payment not available as a defense.²¹

(3) Nature of Fees Taken

Whether the taking of a fee for services for which no fee is provided by law, or a fee greater than that allowed, or a fee for services not performed, or the receipt of a fee before it is due, will render an officer liable for a penalty depends on the statute imposing the penalty.

Where the statute imposes a penalty for the taking of fees for compensation for official services other than as allowed by law, it is generally held that a penalty may be imposed where compensation is taken for services for which no compensation is expressly provided,²² although there is some authority to the contrary;²³ and a similar rule prevails under statutes expressly prohibiting fees not specified therein.²⁴ Under statutes prescribing fixed fees for certain enumerated services and providing a penalty for taking more than the fixed amount for performance of those services, it has been held that there may be extraordinary services not expressly provided for in the fee bill for which an officer may be entitled to a reasonable compensation;²⁵ and it has even been held in such cases that, since the fee is not fixed by law, he will not be liable for the penalty if he receives more than reasonable compensation.²⁶

Under an express statutory provision that officers who perform services for which no fee is especially allowed by statute are entitled to a reasonable compensation, it has been held that an officer is not guilty of extortion unless he takes a fee which he knows to be unreasonable.²⁷

Fees greater than allowed. Under the express terms of the statute to that effect, a penalty is ordinarily imposed for the taking of fees greater in amount than provided by law.²⁸ A penalty imposed for receiving higher fees than allowed cannot be recovered where only the legal fee has been exacted for the protest of the note, although the protest was premature.²⁹

Fees received before due. Under statutes imposing a penalty for the receipt of a fee before it is due, the penalty may be imposed even though no more is taken than will in probability soon be due.³⁰ It is equally criminal for a public officer to refuse to perform a public duty until paid.³¹ Statutes relating to this offense which contain no provision prohibiting the collection of a lawful fee before it is due have been construed not to alter the common law in this particular.³²

Charges for services not performed. Under a strict construction of a statute providing for a penalty where the officer demands and receives any greater fees for any of the services specified than are allowed by statute, the penalty will not be imposed where the officer has in fact performed no services, although he has exacted a fee;³³ but a contrary conclusion has been reached under a statute imposing a forfeiture on any officer making improper charges for official services.³⁴

(4) Intent

Whether an evil or corrupt intent is essential to liability for a penalty for extortion depends on the language of the statute imposing the penalty.

Statutes imposing a penalty where an officer "takes," "receives or takes," or "demands or receives" fees not authorized by law make the gist of the offense depend on the taking without the necessity of proof of an evil or corrupt intent.³⁵ Under such statutes, an agreement by the person injured furnishes no justification for doing what the law forbids;³⁶ nor is it a defense that defendant acted under a mistake or ignorance of the law,³⁷ or in good faith,³⁸ or under the direction of a state officer,³⁹ or under the authority of an execution,⁴⁰ or without claim of personal benefit or gain,⁴¹ or that, if the officer had included certain other legitimate fees to which he was entitled, his charges would have amounted to as much or more.⁴²

42. Ark.—Turner v. Blount, 5 S.W. 589, 49 Ark. 361.

On the other hand, under statutes employing such words as "willfully takes," "willfully and corruptly takes," "knowingly takes," or "unlawfully takes," or stating that the officer shall have been "guilty of extortion," a corrupt intent has been held essential.⁴³ However, it has been held that it is not essential that the taking by the officer should have been for his own use and benefit.⁴⁴

Where it is essential that defendant shall have acted willfully and corruptly, he must have acted knowingly;⁴⁵ and this is likewise true where the statute punishes one who shall knowingly demand more or greater sums than are authorized,⁴⁶ the word "knowingly" being used in the sense of intentionally.⁴⁷ Hence, a penalty cannot be recovered where the officer has acted under an honest mistake,⁴⁸ or in ignorance of the law,⁴⁹ although as to the latter point there is contrary authority.⁵⁰ Where it is regarded as essential that the act has been done with knowledge of its illegality, a uniform and universal custom among officers in the county on which defendant acted in good faith may constitute a defense;⁵¹ but it has been held, to the contrary, that the practice of other officers is not a defense, even though a corrupt intent is an element of the cause of action.⁵²

Unconstitutionality of the basic statute is a defense; but the previous failure of the party injured to raise the question of the illegal fee is not ordinarily a defense. Except where statute provides otherwise, a tender back of the overcharge is no defense.

The unconstitutionality of the statute on which the prosecution is founded is a defense.⁵³ However, it is not a defense that the party injured failed to bring the illegal charge to the attention of the court in a motion to retax costs,⁵⁴ or failed to make a demand for return of the fee illegally charged before bringing action,⁵⁵ or did not inform defendant that his fee was excessive.⁵⁶

Failure to give notice of intention to sue, as defense in some jurisdictions, is considered infra subdivision f (3) of this section.

Tender of overcharge. In the absence of statutory provision, it is no defense that before the action was commenced the officer tendered back to plaintiff the amount of the overcharge;⁵⁷ and nothing less than tender of the full amount of the penalty is available as a defense.⁵⁸ However, the statute may enable an officer to protect himself from prosecution by tender of amends, and the jury are made judges of the sufficiency of the tender.⁵⁹ Under a statute so providing, it has been held that the defense of tender may be available, even though it has not been made in a regular manner, provided the other party has dispensed with it, either by a previous refusal to accept it or by conduct tantamount to a refusal.⁶⁰

d. Persons Entitled to Enforce

Unless the statute provides otherwise, only the person injured or aggrieved has the right to sue for the penalty.

As a general rule, under statutes to that effect, only the person injured or aggrieved has the right to maintain an action for the penalty.⁶¹ A person aggrieved is ordinarily one whose money is withheld.⁶² However, under other statutes so providing, the action for the penalty may be maintained by any person who will sue for it.⁶³

e. Persons Liable

In general, any person occupying an official or quasi-official position may be liable for the penalty. An officer will be liable for a penalty for the acts of his deputy where the deputy acts in the line of his official duty or the officer ratifies his acts.

As in the case of criminal prosecutions, see supra § 9, in general, any officer or person occupying an official or quasi-official position may be liable for the penalty provided.⁶⁴ However, under statutes restricting their operations to particular classes of officers, only officers within such classes may be so liable.⁶⁵

Liability for acts of deputy or agent. An officer is liable for a penalty incurred by the official misconduct of his deputy.⁶⁶ It is not necessary to show that the officer has recognized or adopted the acts of his deputy in order to fix his liability therefor, provided the acts are performed in the line of the agent's official duty;⁶⁷ and it is no objection that the act is of a criminal nature, for which the deputy might be prosecuted criminally.⁶⁸

On the other hand, where the officer ratifies the illegal acts of his deputy, it is immaterial that the acts were outside the line of the deputy's official duty.⁶⁹ Ratification, however, to be available in a suit against the officer, must be shown to have been made with knowledge of the facts, and before the suit was brought.⁷⁰

The liability attaches even though the money taken by the agent has not been paid over to his principal.⁷¹

(1) In General

The nature of an action for the penalty is ex contractu, and debt is the proper action; but the party aggrieved may sue for the penalty or for the recovery of the money paid. The action does not survive his death.

The nature of an action to enforce a penalty for extortion is essentially ex contractu, and not ex delicto;⁷² and debt is the proper action to enforce such liability, unless the statute otherwise provides.⁷³ The nature and form of action to enforce penalties generally are considered in Penalties § 8.

Abatement and revival. The action, being purely personal, and by way of punishment, does not survive to the administrators of the party injured.⁷⁴ However, where the injured party is a partnership, the cause of action does not abate by the dissolution of the partnership, but survives to the individual members.⁷⁵

Election of remedies. The party aggrieved may have an election between an action on the statute for a penalty and remedy by an ordinary action at law for the recovery of the money paid against the officer or the officer and his sureties.⁷⁶

(2) Jurisdiction

What court has jurisdiction in actions for penalties for extortion generally depends on the amount sued for, except in so far as specific provision regarding jurisdiction is made by statute.

In general, the amount of the penalty sued for determines the jurisdiction of the court, so that, if the sum of the charges against an officer for the taking of illegal fees amounts to enough to give a particular court jurisdiction, the demand may be sued for in that court.⁷⁷ However, where the applicable statute contains provisions regarding jurisdiction, jurisdiction is determined by such statute.⁷⁸ Thus, where a statute provides that a particular court has jurisdiction to determine the correctness of any charge or charges for costs in cases pending in that court, the amount involved becomes immaterial.⁷⁹

State courts can entertain suits against federal officers for acts done by virtue of their office.⁸⁰

If a court wrongfully refuses to exercise its jurisdiction, it may be compelled so to do by mandamus.⁸¹

(3) Conditions Precedent and Time to Sue

Under statute to that effect, notice to the officer of intention to sue is a condition precedent to an action for a penalty for extortion. The action must be brought within the time specified by statute.

Under statute to that effect, in at least one jurisdiction, notice to the officer of intention to sue must be served before suing out the writ,⁸² and failure to give such notice will constitute a defense.⁸³ Such a statute has been held not to be repealed by subsequent statutes omitting this requirement.⁸⁴ The required notice to the officer need not specify what fees the officer was entitled to receive;⁸⁵ nor need it give notice that plaintiff was proceeding under any particular statute;⁸⁶ it is sufficient if it states substantially plaintiff's cause of complaint.⁸⁷

The statutory requirement of notice applies only to an action for a penalty, and is not extended to an action of assumpsit, to recover back the fees illegally taken.⁸⁸

It is not necessary that an officer who is subject to the penalty shall be first convicted in a criminal action as a condition precedent to the bringing of a civil suit against him to recover the penalty.⁸⁹

Time to sue and limitations. Where, by statute, an action for the recovery of any penalty must be commenced within a specified limit of time, an action to recover a penalty for the extortionate act of a public officer comes within the terms of the statute, and failure to bring the action within the statutory period is a defense.⁹⁰

(4) Process

Statutory requirements regarding process must be observed.

In an action for the penalty, statutory requirements regarding process must be observed.⁹¹

(5) Pleading

The complaint in an action to enforce a penalty for extortion must state the statutory requirements with certainty, although the exact phrasing of the statute need not be used. A defective complaint may be cured by the verdict where it shows a good cause of action. A variance between allegation and proof is fatal only where it is as to material facts.

As in other actions for the recovery of penalties, see Penalties § 15, the complaint in an action to enforce a penalty for extortion must state the statutory requirements with the same degree of certainty as is required in an indictment in a criminal case;⁹² and it will be construed with the same strictness.⁹³ However, the allegation need not be in the exact phrasing of the statute.⁹⁴

Particular allegations. Under a statute providing a penalty for extortionate acts to be recovered by the party injured, an allegation that plaintiff is the party injured is necessary;⁹⁵ but an allegation in the exact phrasing of the statute is not necessary, an allegation of facts showing the plaintiff to be the party injured being sufficient.⁹⁶

Where, by statute, an action for the recovery of a penalty must be commenced within a limit of time, although it is usual to aver that the offense by which the penalty was incurred was committed within such time, such allegation is not necessary.⁹⁷

96. Pa.—Miller v. Lockwood, supra.

Party making payment

"It is a mistake of fact to allege that the declaration 'does not set forth that the plaintiff is the party injured.' It appears that he was the grantee in the deed which was recorded; that he was the person for whose benefit the service was rendered; that he was the party liable for the legal fees, and that he was the person who paid the sum illegally taken. He is, therefore, 'the party injured.'"

Pa.—Miller v. Lockwood, supra.

97. N.H.—Fowler v. Tuttle, 24 N.H. 9.

An allegation of the services for which fees were charged is necessary,⁹⁸ in terms bringing the rendition of the services within the statutory definition,⁹⁹ and with sufficient certainty to enable the court to conclude from facts stated whether or not the compensation received was other than that authorized or permitted by law.¹

The amount taken must be specifically alleged;² but it is sufficient, where a number of fees are involved, that the allegation state the aggregate sum taken.³

Where the statute provides a penalty for the charging for services not actually performed, it is not necessary that it be averred that the charges were knowingly or willfully made.⁴

Aider by verdict. Where a complaint, although defective, is sufficient to show a good cause of action, it may be cured by the verdict;⁵ but a verdict will not so operate with respect to a bad cause of action.⁶ So declarations have been held sufficient, after verdict, which in an untechnical manner alleged that the fees received exceeded the legal fees,⁷ or which omitted the items of illegal fees taken and merely alleged the items of service and the aggregate amount taken,⁸ or stated the circumstances and the amount but did not allege the illegal fee and the excess charged,⁹ or merely alleged that for levying and collecting a certain sum defendant received a certain amount greater than allowed by law.¹⁰

In an action to recover a penalty for the receipt of illegal fees for service of execution, the failure of the declaration to state from what court execution issued or to what court it was returnable is cured by verdict where the declaration states the parties and the date of the execution so that the charges may be pleadable in bar to another action for the same extortion.¹¹ A declaration which contains no allegation that any person received any fees for the service of an execution is not cured by verdict.¹²

Issues, proof, and variance. Proof that extortionate fees were taken from a person other than the person alleged to be the party injured will not support a conviction.¹³ A variance between allegation and proof as to material facts or circumstances surrounding the extortionate act is fatal;¹⁴ but a variance as to some immaterial fact is not fatal.¹⁵ A variance between allegation and proof as to the amount of money taken is not material.¹⁶

Joinder of counts. A count in debt for the statutory penalties may be joined with one for money had and received where the entire recovery goes to the party aggrieved.¹⁷

(6) Evidence

The plaintiff has the burden of proving facts entitling him to the penalty, such as the existence of corrupt intent, where such intent is an element of the offense; but the defendant has the burden as to matters of defense.

In an action to enforce a penalty for extortion, plaintiff has the burden of proving the existence of facts entitling him to the penalty.¹⁸ Thus, the burden of establishing corrupt intent, where such intent is essential to liability for a penalty, is on plaintiff;¹⁹ and, where defendant must have acted willfully and corruptly, it must be shown that he knew of a statutory provision for compensation.²⁰ Where, however, intent is not an element of the cause of action, the burden does not rest on plaintiff to prove a corrupt intent.²¹

Mass.—Runnells v. Fletcher, 15 Mass. 525.

Allegation held sufficient

If the action is to recover the penalty for taking fees for services for which no fees are allowed by law, it is sufficient to aver that they were taken for services not allowed to be compensated for, without specifying the services for which they were demanded.

On the other hand, the burden is on defendant to show that he acted under a mistake or a misapprehension of fact;²² and where good faith is regarded as a defense, it must be established by defendant.²³

The admissibility of evidence in actions for a penalty for extortion depends on the materiality of the evidence.²⁴

(7) Trial, Judgment, New Trial, and Review

Rules governing trials and the proceedings after trial in civil actions generally apply in actions for a penalty for extortion. An officer is subject to one penalty for one collection, even though several illegal charges are included therein.

Rules governing trials in civil actions generally have been applied in actions for a penalty for extortion.²⁵ Thus, in a jurisdiction where it is held that evil intent is in issue as an element of the offense, it is a question of fact for the jury to determine whether defendant was acting willfully and corruptly, or innocently and fairly, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence;²⁶ but under a statute making the taking of an illegal fee the gist of the offense, it is reversible error for the court to submit to the jury the question whether or not the law has been violated where the illegal charge is proved by plaintiff and admitted by defendant.²⁷

Judgment and amount of recovery. Where a public officer makes out a fee bill containing several illegal charges, he is liable to only one penalty and not a separate penalty for each item.²⁸ A statute making an officer liable if he "shall charge in his bill of costs for services not done, etc.," is construed to be in affirmance of this rule.²⁹

New trial and arrest of judgment. A motion in arrest of judgment will be sustained because of the lack of essential allegations affecting plaintiff's title to his action,³⁰ such as a failure to allege that anyone received the fees;³¹ but judgment will not be arrested when the defect is not in the title, but in the form of declaring it.³²

Appeal and error. The verdict of the jury on issues of fact is final where there is sufficient evidence in the case to support it.³³

I. IN GENERAL

§ 1. Definition and Distinctions

Extradition is the surrender by one state or nation to another of an individual accused or convicted of an offense outside its own territory and within the territorial jurisdiction of the other, which, being competent to try, and punish him, demands the surrender.

Extradition may be sufficiently defined as the surrender by one state or nation to another of an individual accused or convicted of an offense outside of its own territory, and within the territorial jurisdiction of the other, which, being competent to try and punish him, demands the surrender.¹ Extradition involves a demand by one sovereign upon another sovereign for the surrender of a fugitive for trial and the surrender of such person to the demanding sovereign.^{1.5} It is to be distinguished from transportation and from deportation, which also result in the removal of a person from the country,² and from banishment.³

Extradition proceedings are no part of the trial,^{3.5} and are somewhat analogous to the original warrant in an ordinary prosecution.^{3.10}

II. INTERSTATE EXTRADITION

§ 2. Foundation and Nature of Right

The right of interstate extradition is founded on, and controlled by, the federal Constitution and effectuating federal statutes. Proceedings for interstate extradition are sui generis, and the right can be exercised only by a government at the request of a government, and only in criminal cases.

The right of a state to demand the extradition or rendition by another state of a person who has committed an offense against its laws and has thereafter fled to the other state is founded on, and controlled by, the Constitution of the United States⁴ and effectuating federal statutes.⁵ The right created by the federal Constitution is a guarantee of which a state may avail itself to secure the return of an offender against its laws.^{5,5} It is not dependent on interstate comity, courtesy, or contract,⁶ nor is it governed by the same principles as are applicable to international extradition,⁷ although some authorities have regarded it as in the nature of a treaty stipulation between the states of the Union.⁸

Proceedings for interstate extradition or rendition are *sui generis*⁹ and constitute an executive function.¹⁰ The proceedings are summary,^{10,5} rath-

Compact between states

(1) The federal constitutional provision that a person charged in any state with a crime who shall flee from justice and be found in another state shall on demand of executive authority of state from which he fled be delivered up and removed to state having jurisdiction of the crime is in the nature of a compact between all the states and is a provision that the state must recognize. Their purpose is to prevent the successful escape of any person who has been accused of crime, whether or not convicted;¹¹ and extradition provides the regular and only course for returning one arrested for crime in a sister state, unless the prisoner voluntarily consents to return.¹² It can be exercised only by a government at the request of a government,¹³ and it will not be permitted to be used for the collection of debt,¹⁴ or the gratification of personal malice,^{14.5} or made subservient to purely private interests.^{14.10}

The scheme of interstate rendition contemplates a prompt return of the fugitive as soon as the state from which he fled demands him.^{14.15} The right of extradition gives no extraterritorial force to the laws of the demanding state, but merely provides a means by which to secure the return of a prisoner to that state, so that within its own confines its laws may be executed.¹⁵ Since the purpose of extradition is the return of a fugitive, none of his constitutional rights, other than his right to personal liberty, are involved.^{15.5}

Summary executive proceeding

Constitutional provision for interstate extradition is intended to provide a summary executive proceeding by which states can promptly aid one another in bringing to trial persons accused of crime by preventing their finding in one state an asylum against processes of justice of another.

§ 3. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

While constitutional and statutory provisions relating to interstate extradition should be liberally construed to effect their purposes, their essential elements and requirements must be strictly followed. State legislation, to the extent to which it aids and is not inconsistent with the federal Constitution and statutes, is valid and proper.

As is stated supra § 2, the right of interstate extradition or rendition is founded on, and controlled by, the Constitution of the United States and effectuating federal statutes, which have been declared constitutional.¹⁷ Extradition being a federal and not a state matter,¹⁸ the federal law, and not the state law, is supreme,¹⁹ and any state legislation which conflicts with the federal law on the subject, as embodied in the constitution and effectuating statutes, is unconstitutional and void.²⁰ However, to the extent that it aids and facilitates the operation of federal constitutional and statutory provisions, and is not inconsistent therewith, state legislation is proper,²¹ and hence, state legislation which aids

Exercise of executive right under uniform criminal extradition law to

Constitutional and statutory provisions relating to interstate extradition should be liberally construed to effectuate their purposes;²⁵ but, since such provisions involve the substantial rights of citizens,²⁶ their essential elements and requirements have been required to be strictly followed.²⁷

The federal Constitution guarantees no right of asylum to a person who has committed a crime in one state and fled to another.²⁸ grant or refuse rendition of a fugitive does not violate separation of powers provision of state constitution.

N.H.—Koch v. O'Brien, 131 A.2d 63, 101 N.H. 11.

Accessory after fact

Where alleged fugitive was not in demanding state when burglary was committed but evidence indicated that he had received property procured in burglary and was accessory after fact to burglary under law of that state, he was subject to extradition.

Ohio.—Nagie v. Langley, App., 121 N.E.2d 201.

Uniform Criminal Extradition Act has application only between the states which adopted it and cannot be invoked to regulate the procedure by which a person is surrendered by a state to jurisdiction of federal court, there to answer criminal charges against him.

Pa.—Commonwealth ex rel. Patton v. Tees, 118 A.2d 585, 179 Pa.Super. 605.

Uniform Support of Dependents Act

(1) Uniform Support of Dependents Act was designed to facilitate rather than to prevent extradition. Ohio.—Sands v. Sands, Com.Pl., 136 N.E.2d 747.

(2) Provisions of Support Act authorizing extradition of a person for the crime of nonsupport although he was not present in demanding state at time of commission of crime charged and had not fled therefrom are valid and enforceable.

Fla.—State v. Bennett, 90 So.2d 43. Tex.—Ex parte Coleman, 245 S.W.2d 712, 157 Tex.Cr. 37.

(3) Legislature, by using the words "failing to provide for the support of a person" in a provision of the Uniform Enforcement of Support Act providing for extradition of a person charged in a demanding state with the crime of failing to provide for the support of a person in such other state, intended, by this language, to encompass all forms of criminal nonsupport with a view to facilitate extradition of persons seeking to evade their obligations by flight, and therefore, the crime of abandonment of minor children fell within the terms of such statute.

Fla.—State v. Bennett, 90 So.2d 43.

(4) A person who is about to be extradited under criminal enforcement provisions of Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Law may relieve himself from such extradition by voluntarily submitting himself to a court of competent jurisdiction in state of his residence and complying with such court's order as to the amount of support he should pay to obligee, even though the obligee-resident of the demanding state has not initiated proceedings under the civil enforcement provisions of the act.

Fla.—Jackson v. Hall, 97 So.2d 1.

(5) Father could not avoid extradition to another state to answer charge of child desertion, by procuring in state of forum an order for support under the Uniform Support of Dependents Act.

(6) Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act contemplates two distinct courses of action in the enforcement of support duties, namely, extradition and initiation of civil proceedings in demanding state, with an opportunity thereafter given obligor to submit to subsequently assumed jurisdiction of court in responding state, and while either or both courses of action may be pursued, the election lies wholly with the demanding state and the obligee. No shield for malefactors

Constitutional provision requiring extradition from one state to another was adopted to promote justice

§ 4. Authority or Duty to Demand or Deliver Persons Accused

The authority to demand the extradition of a person charged with crime, and the correlative duty to deliver up such a person on proper demand, rest with the executive authorities of the respective states. While the duty has been said to be imperative, there is no power, in the absence of state statute, to compel the executive of the asylum state to act.

The authority to demand the extradition or rendition of a person charged with crime, and the correlative duty to deliver up such a person on proper demand, rest with the executive authorities of the respective states.²⁹ The authority and duty rest on the Constitution and laws of the United States and not on the principle of comity, and are not dependent on the existence of any state statute.³⁰ Since the constitutional and statutory requirements are jurisdictional,³¹ if any of them are wanting the executive of the asylum state has no authority to deliver up the person demanded.³² Where, however, a compliance with all constitutional and statutory prerequisites is shown, it is the duty of the executive to whom the demand is presented to cause the arrest and surrender of the fugitive,³³ irrespective of the nature of the crime or the policy or laws of the demanding state.³⁴

Comity between states

(1) State statute on subject of extradition is unconstitutional only when it seeks to abridge or lessen duty placed by Constitution on part of chief executive of asylum state, and any state statute which facilitates rendition of persons charged with crime is not in conflict with federal Constitution and rests rather upon comity between states and not upon federal Constitution.

Tex.—Ex parte Peairs, 263 S.W.2d 755, 162 Tex.Cr. 243, appeal dismissed Peairs v. State of Tex., 76 S.Ct. 104, 350 U.S. 858, 100 L.Ed. 762.

(2) States have power, in area not covered by constitutional and federal statutory enactments covering fugitives, to render up as matter of comity those within their borders against whom valid charge of crime lies in sister state, and if such waiver is intended, it should be given effect but it should not be imposed as legal fiction in order to make prompt trial in both jurisdictions possible. U.S.—U. S. ex rel. Moulthrop v. Matus, D.C.Conn., 127 F.Supp. 282.

Federal law as recognition and not grant of power

The United States constitution and statutes, while not constituting a grant of power, are in express recognition of the authority theretofore existing in the governor of a state to demand of the executive of another state the extradition of a fugitive from justice.

Absolute obligation

Extradition clause of federal Constitution creates absolute obligation on each state to surrender criminals fleeing from justice of another state. N.J.—Powell v. Meyer, 43 A.2d 175, 23 N.J.Misc. 222, certiorari denied 46 A.2d 671, 134 N.J.Law 169.

34. N.C.—Ex parte Hubbard, 160 S.E. 569, 201 N.C. 472, 81 A.L.R. 547.

This duty is ministerial³⁵ and not discretionary,³⁶ and should be faithfully discharged.³⁷ It has been said, however, not to be an absolute or unqualified duty, but to be dependent on the circumstances of each particular case;³⁸ and, while it has been said to be imperative in every case in which it arises,³⁹ in the absence of statute there is no power to compel the executive of the asylum state to act.⁴⁰

While it is the duty of a state to see that the rights of its citizens are protected against illegal action arising in another state,⁴¹ it is of equal importance to the entire people that the courts avoid in extradition proceedings a view of their duties so narrow as to afford within its borders permanent asylum to offenders against the laws of another state.⁴²

Effect of delay. Where a state is entitled to return of a person, its postponement of the exercise of such right is not a waiver thereof.^{42.5}

Operation of extradition law. The right of the governor to surrender a person to the authorities of a sister state depends on the status of the law on the date of the demand, rather than at the date alleged as that of the commission of the crime.^{42.10}

§ 5. — To or from Territories

Extradition to or from territories has been upheld under the federal statute and the law of nations.

Although the United States Constitution is silent as to extradition to or from territories, the extradition of fugitives from justice to or from a territory, as well as to or from a state, has been upheld by the courts under the federal statute⁴³ and under the law of nations.⁴⁴ The federal statute has been held applicable to Puerto Rico⁴⁵ and to the former Indian territory.⁴⁶ Extradition statutes of territories have been held to afford an adequate remedy for returning a prisoner from one territory to another.^{46.5}

§ 6. — To or from District of Columbia

The chief justice of the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia acts for the District in extradition proceedings.

Under federal statute, the chief justice of the dis-

§ 7. Extraditable Offenses

The offenses for which a person may be extradited include every offense made punishable by the law of the state in which it was committed, from the highest to the lowest in the grade of offenses, including misdemeanors and statutory crimes, whether or not the offense charged is a crime under the laws of the state of asylum.

The words of the Constitution "treason, felony or other crime," in referring to extraditable offenses, include every offense made punishable by the law of the state in which it was committed, from the highest to the lowest in the grade of offenses,⁴⁹ including misdemeanors⁵⁰ and statutory crimes,⁵¹ and including acts which have been made crimes by statute since the adoption of the Constitution and the passage of the federal extradition statute.⁵² Under the rules adopted by the Interstate Extradition Conference of 1877 demands for the extradition of persons charged with petty offenses are not to be made or honored except in special cases under aggravating circumstances.⁵³

The offense must be definite and specific,⁵⁴ and must be of a strictly criminal public character.⁵⁵ It is immaterial whether the offense charged is a crime under the laws of the state on which the demand is made.⁵⁶

Where the prisoner has broken his parole and escaped to another state, the basis of extradition has been held to be the crime for which he was originally committed and not the breaking of his parole.⁵⁷

The mere transition from territorial to state government is insufficient of itself to preclude the state from obtaining the return of a fugitive by extradition proceedings to answer for a crime committed by him against the territorial law; to prevent such return it must appear that the offense no longer exists in the demanding state.⁵⁸

§ 8. Persons Who May Be Extradited

Only persons falling within the constitutional and statutory description may be extradited.

In order that a person may be extradited he must fall within the description contained in the constitutional and statutory provisions under which his extradition is sought.⁵⁹ Thus it must appear he has been formally charged with a crime in the demanding state, as discussed infra § 9, that he has fled therefrom,⁶⁰ and that he has been found within the state or territory from which his extradition is sought.⁶¹

A person may be extradited although he has escaped from confinement in a hospital for the insane,⁶² but the governor of the asylum state may refuse to surrender as a fugitive from justice one who is a citizen of that state and has duly been adjudged a lunatic and detained as such in a place designated by the court of the asylum state.⁶³

§ 9. — Charge of Crime

No person is subject to extradition until a criminal charge has been regularly made against him in the state which demands jurisdiction of him. A person remains "charged" with crime even after conviction if the judgment of conviction remains unsatisfied.

No person is subject to extradition until a criminal charge has been made against him by regular judicial proceedings in the state which demands jurisdiction of him.⁶⁴ The charge must be of a specific crime and not of an indefinite wrong.⁶⁵ The offense alleged must be a crime by the law of the demanding state,⁶⁶ but it is immaterial that the charge would be insufficient in the state on which

When person "charged" with crime. As used in constitutional and statutory provisions relating to extradition, the term "charged" is construed in its broad signification to cover any proceeding which a state may see fit to adopt by which a formal accusation is made against an alleged criminal.⁶⁸ In a stricter sense, however, a person is "charged" with crime when an affidavit is filed alleging the commission of the offense and a warrant is issued for his arrest.⁶⁹ A person remains charged with crime within the meaning of the constitutional and statutory provisions although he has been convicted, while the judgment of conviction remains unsatisfied,⁷⁰ and, after a charge of crime has culminated in a conviction, the record of such conviction is sufficient evidence in extradition proceedings, the question of the sufficiency of the preliminary affidavits in the proceeding in which he was convicted becoming immaterial.⁷¹

§ 10. — Status as Fugitive from Justice

- a. Necessity
- b. Who are fugitives from justice

a. Necessity

A person is not subject to extradition under the federal Constitution and statutes unless he is a fugitive from justice, but the right to resist extradition on this ground may be waived.

Under the provisions of the federal Constitution and statutes enacted in aid thereof, it is essential that the person whose return is sought be a fugitive from justice,⁷² and in the absence of a

b. Who Are Fugitives from Justice

- (1) In general
- (2) Escaped or paroled prisoners

(1) In General

A fugitive from justice, in the law of extradition, is one who, having committed or been charged with a crime in one state, has left its jurisdiction, and is found within the territory of another when it is sought to subject him to the criminal process of the former state. The purpose, motive, or manner of his flight is usually held immaterial, as is the fact that the state authorities or the complainant knew of, or consented to, his departure.

Quoted in: Kan.—Justice v. Lockett, 259 P.2d 152, 157, 175 Kan. 25.

Within the meaning of constitutional and statutory provisions governing interstate extradition, a "fugitive from justice" may be defined as a person who, having committed or been charged with a crime in one state, has left its jurisdiction and is found within the territory of another when it is sought to subject him to the criminal process of the former state.⁷⁵ To constitute one a fugitive from

Voluntary appearance as waiver

Tenn.—State ex rel. Lea v. Brown, 64 S.W.2d 841, 166 Tenn. 669, 91 A.L.R. 1246, certiorari denied State of Tennessee ex rel. Lea v. Brown, 54 S.Ct. 717, 292 U.S. 638, 78 L.Ed. 1491.

(2) Where relator voluntarily appeared in foreign state to answer criminal charges and, after entering into an appearance bond, was released pending trial, and left foreign state and failed to appear for trial, relator thereby submitted himself to jurisdiction of court and waived any right he originally had to resist extradition.

Voluntary return

Where petitioner was arrested in Alabama on warrant issued in Illinois charging child abandonment, and petitioner voluntarily returned to Illinois, and there made bail, and petitioner's wife did not appear as a witness on date case was called and petitioner returned to Alabama, petitioner waived any right he had originally to resist extradition on ground that petitioner was not present in Illinois at time of commission of alleged offense, and by such action submitted himself to the jurisdiction of Illinois.

Ala.—Kay v. State, 37 So.2d 525, 34 Ala.App. 8, certiorari denied 37 So. 2d 529, 251 Ala. 419.

Agreement not to resist extradition

(1) An agreement signed by prisoner as condition of being paroled from custody in Pennsylvania that prisoner waived extradition to Pennsylvania and that he would not contest any effort to return him to Pennsylvania was binding, as against contention that prisoner could not waive his constitutional rights in advance, since constitutional rights can be waived.

Effect of return

Where defendant was effectively charged in Oregon with commission of crime of burning his insured automobile with intent to defraud insurer, and it was not denied that he was in the state when the crime was committed and had left Oregon and that he was presently in the state of Washington, defendant was a fugitive from justice even though he had returned to the site of his alleged crime and stayed there for several days on at least two occasions.

Fear of violence

That one charged with a crime fled to another state from fear of mob violence does not alter the fact that he is a fugitive from justice.

Ill.—People ex rel. Heard v. Babb, 107 N.E.2d 740, 412 Ill. 507.

the person charged should have left the state in which the crime is alleged to have been committed in the belief that he had violated the criminal law and for the purpose of avoiding a prosecution anticipated or begun,⁸⁶ although there is some authority to the effect that the formation of a criminal intent before departure may be required,⁸⁷ and that consciousness of guilt may be a necessary element in proving accused to be a fugitive in a class of crimes which are known to a single locality and not general, or even usual.⁸⁸ A person may be a fugitive even though he left the state on legitimate business⁸⁹ or was returning to his home in another state,⁹⁰ or was induced to come to the asylum state by fraud.⁹¹

Manner of flight. The mode or manner of a person's departure from the state generally does not affect his status as a fugitive from justice;⁹² so the fact that a person's departure was involuntary or under legal compulsion will not, under most authorities, preclude his extradition as a fugitive from justice;⁹³ and, while it has been said that a person leaving a state in the custody of an officer is not a fugitive,⁹⁴ this statement has been criticized and rejected.^{94.5} A convicted prisoner en route to

Where answers to letters from presiding justice of district court of appeal to Illinois, Louisiana, and federal penitentiary officials indicated that parole, granted habeas corpus petitioner while serving term in Illinois penitentiary, was canceled by Illinois officials in 1930 and that they never knew of petitioner's subsequent whereabouts until his imprisonment on conviction of felony in California in 1945 and they filed no detainers or orders to hold petitioner while he was serving terms in Louisiana and federal prisons, Illinois authorities did not waive right to extradite petitioner from California after such parole would otherwise have expired.

§ 11. — Persons in Custody in Asylum State

A person held on a criminal charge in the asylum state at the time of the demand need not be surrendered until the judgment of that state is satisfied, but the executive thereof may surrender him if he so chooses. Authorities disagree as to whether a refusal to extradite is justified where accused is in custody on a civil charge.

If at the time of the demand accused is held on a criminal charge in the state where he is a fugitive, he need not be surrendered until after the judgment of that state is satisfied.⁵ The executive authority of the asylum state may withhold a rendition request until the fugitive has completed a prison sentence imposed by a court of the asylum state,^{5,5} but this is a matter of executive discretion and not a personal right of the fugitive.^{5,10} However, while there is some authority to the contrary,⁶ it is usually held that the executive of the asylum state may waive the right of that state to retain the prisoner, and may surrender him to the demanding state,⁷

In Massachusetts

(1) It has been held that the governor alone has no authority, without exercising his powers of pardon or commutation of sentence, to surrender a fugitive on whom a sentence of a Massachusetts court is being executed in the state prison, such action being deemed an interference with the judicial branch of the government.

before⁸ or after⁹ the fugitive's arrest, on his acquittal,¹⁰ or after his conviction and while he is still undergoing, or subject to, punishment in the asylum state.¹¹

Even if custody of the prisoner has been obtained by requisition, he may be extradited to another state on the receipt of a requisition from that state.¹²

On civil charge. That accused is already in custody on a civil charge in the state to which he has fled does not, under some authorities, excuse a refusal by the executive of that state to comply with the requisition of the governor of another state;¹³ but other decisions are to a different effect.¹⁴ demand from the state from which he fled.¹⁵ Statutes providing for the detention of fugitives have been held to be constitutional,¹⁶ and merely to implement the common law and prescribe the procedure which shall be followed in connection with the arrest, detention, and removal of the fugitive.^{16.5}

The legislature has the power to prescribe a statutory mode of procedure for the preliminary arrest and detention of a fugitive from another state and to affix such conditions thereto as it may deem proper,¹⁷ and where such statutes exist they must be strictly complied with,¹⁸ and the arrest and detention otherwise are illegal.^{18.5} An alleged fugitive has the right not to be imprisoned or dealt with by the states in disregard of the safeguards provided by the federal Constitution and statutes.¹⁹ Arrest of a fugitive from justice not charged with a crime for which he might be imprisoned for more than a year on a "detainer" telegram is a violation of the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act.^{19.5}

b. Necessity for Arrest Warrant

Although there is authority to the contrary, in some jurisdictions a fugitive from justice from another state may be arrested without a warrant, but in such case he must be taken before a magistrate without unnecessary delay and a proper warrant procured.

In some jurisdictions an officer has no authority to arrest without a warrant a fugitive from justice from another state,²⁰ even on telegraphic or personal request of the officers of the demanding state.^{20.5}

Ala.—Cunningham v. Baker, 16 So. 68, 104 Ala. 160, 53 Am.S.R. 27.

In other jurisdictions an arrest may be made by an officer without a warrant, at least under certain circumstances, as where the fugitive has committed a felony,²¹ and a telegram from authorities of a sister state requesting that a designated person be held for extradition is a sufficient basis for his provisional arrest and detention.^{21.5} If the fugitive is an escaping felon he may be arrested by a private citizen without a warrant and afterward detained by order of court.²²

Where an arrest is made without a warrant, a proper warrant should be procured and the charge formulated as soon as possible.^{22.5} In such case, the prisoner must be taken before a magistrate as soon as possible, without unnecessary delay, or with all practicable speed, and where he is not so taken within a reasonable time, his subsequent imprisonment is illegal.^{22.10} Under some statutes, an accused arrested without a demand from the executive of the demanding state must be taken before a magistrate for the issuance of a warrant.^{22.15}

It has been held that a preliminary affidavit for a detention warrant need not contain the essentials of the charge.²³ The complaint on which a warrant is issued, however, must show that accused has been legally charged with crime in the demanding state.²⁴ Under some statutes, including the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, a person may be arrested on a warrant issued by a judicial officer of the asylum state on the charge on oath of some credible person that the arrested person committed a crime in another state and fled from justice.^{24.5} A lawful signature to the warrant for arrest is essential to its issuance, and if it is not signed by one with authority to do so, the mere involuntary custody of one held under it will not waive the defect or confer jurisdiction.^{24.10} A credible witness within the meaning of such a statute is one who is competent and worthy of belief.^{24.15}

c. Effect of Illegal Preliminary Detention on Extradition Proceedings

The illegality of the original arrest or detention of a fugitive from justice from another state will not affect the validity of subsequent proper extradition proceedings.

A fugitive from justice from another state cannot urge, in opposition to proper extradition proceedings, the fact that his original arrest or detention was illegal.²⁶ Once proper proceedings have been instituted, it is too late to claim that the preliminary detention was illegal.²⁷ such documents, but hearing could be continued for thirty days from date of affidavit pending efforts of authorities to have documents properly authenticated.

La.—State v. Rutledge, 155 So. 392, 179 La. 897.

Exhaustion of power

Under statute authorizing judge to commit fugitive from foreign jurisdiction for period not exceeding thirty days to enable arrest of such accused on extradition warrant, and authorizing a recommitment for further period of not to exceed sixty days, judge was not authorized to fix several successive periods within the thirty and sixty day periods, and, having fixed an original period of fifteen days and having recommitted accused for second fifteen day period, judge's jurisdiction was exhausted, rendering void any further attempt to recommit accused.

Mo.—Christopher v. Tozer, App., 263 S.W.2d 864.

Successive affidavits

Where indictment, accompanying requisition for extradition of fugitive from justice, was not certified by governor of demanding state, no proper demand for fugitive's return was made, and asylum state could not hold him in prison under successive affidavits beyond statutory thirty day period.

§ 13. Requisition

- a. In general
- b. Sufficiency of requisition
- c. Second requisition

a. In General

To secure the extradition of a person, substantial compliance with the prescribed procedure is required, and generally a requisition or demand for extradition must be made by the governor or chief executive of the demanding state or territory to the governor of the asylum state.

Substantial compliance with the procedure prescribed is necessary and sufficient for a valid extradition.^{29.50} Although in some jurisdictions the demanding state has the option of proceeding by direct application to the governor of the asylum state for a writ of extradition, or by complaint under oath to any judge, justice of the peace, or police magistrate of the asylum state in the manner prescribed by state statute,^{29.55} as a general rule, a requisition or demand for extradition must be made by the chief executive or other designated officer of the demanding state to the chief executive of the asylum state.^{29.60}

The requisition or demand for extradition may be for the return of a fugitive,^{29.65} in which case the procedure to be followed is governed by the federal Constitution and the federal legislation thereunder,³⁰ or it may be for the surrender of a person charged in the demanding state with committing an act in the asylum state, or in a third state, intentionally resulting in a crime in the demanding state,^{30.5} in which case the federal legislation is not applicable

N.Y.—People ex rel. Swanson v. Fitzsimmons, 153 N.Y.S.2d 772, 2 A.D. 2d 235.

Authorization for action taken

Where the requisition asks for the surrender of a person charged with committing an act in the asylum, or a third, state intentionally resulting in a crime in the demanding state, the demand is more properly termed a request, and the governor of the asylum state may cause the arrest and delivery in the exercise of his discretion, and in so doing finds his

and the procedure is authorized and governed by state legislation.^{30.10} If extradition is sought for the abandonment, desertion, or nonsupport of a person or persons in the demanding state, it may be under a procedure prescribed by statutes specifically dealing with that subject, such as a Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act.^{30.15}

Where extradition is sought under one procedure, it is improper to cause the arrest and delivery to be made pursuant to another procedure,^{30.20} and where the federal procedure is followed, it takes priority over any other state process by which the fugitive is held and renders such proceedings functus officio.^{30.25} A requisition which asserts the commission of the offense in the demanding state, the flight of the fugitive therefrom, and his taking refuge in the asylum state is insufficient where it appears that he is sought to be extradited for an act in the asylum state which resulted in a crime in the demanding state.^{30.30} There is authority, however, which holds that one charged in the demanding state with desertion and abandonment of minor children is subject to extradition under a statute authorizing the surrender of one who was not in the demanding state at the time of the commission of the crime, even though the requisition was not predicated on such statute by name or number or other allegation, but recited that the governor of the demanding state was acting by virtue of the federal Constitution and laws.^{30.35}

Written demand. To procure the extradition of a criminal the chief executive or other designated officer of the state from which the accused has fled must send a written demand to the chief executive of the state where the criminal is alleged to be, demanding him as a fugitive from justice.³¹

Second warrant on same requisition. If a prisoner escapes from arrest before being taken from the state,³² or if he becomes a fugitive again after he has been delivered to the demanding state,³³ the governor may issue a second warrant without waiting for a new requisition.

Authority to demand extradition. The authority to demand the extradition of fugitives from justice is vested by statute in particular officers of the jurisdiction from which accused has fled,³⁴ such as the governor of the state,³⁵ or the chief justice of the District of Columbia.³⁶ As a requisition by the governor is an official act, it may be signed by a person given by statute the power of an acting governor during the governor's disability,³⁷ and a requisition which has already been made is not affected by a change of governors.³⁸

Application to executive of demanding state. The application to the executive of the state to make requisition for the delivery of a fugitive from justice is usually made by some person designated by statute,³⁹ but it seems that any person may make such application,⁴⁰ if it is made in good faith.⁴¹ Under the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, the prosecutor's application for the institution of extradition proceedings must accompany the requisition.⁴²

b. Sufficiency of Requisition

Within the area of extradition preempted by the federal legislation, the sufficiency of a requisition or demand for extradition is tested thereby, in that additional requirements may not be imposed; generally all the elements or jurisdictional facts essential to extradition must appear on the face of the papers, such as the fugitive status of the person demanded and that he is charged with the commission of a crime.

The sufficiency of a requisition or demand for extradition is tested by the federal Constitution and statutes within the area of extradition preempted by the federal legislation,⁴³ and this is particularly true where there is no state statute setting forth the requirements thereof.^{43.5} Additional requirements imposed by state statutes need not be complied with to make a requisition valid.⁴⁴ State legisla-

Mandatory requirement

Ohio.—In re McMeans, Com.Pl., 146 N.E.2d 159.

State statutory requirement

Provision of Uniform Criminal Extradition Act providing that no demand for extradition of a person charged with crime in another state shall be recognized by the governor unless alleging that accused was present in demanding state at the time of the commission of the alleged crime is not in conflict with the federal Constitution and statutes on the subject and is valid.

Fla.—State v. Bennett, 90 So.2d 43.

Crime requiring accused's presence

A demand plainly showing that an alleged fugitive from justice is charged with a crime, the nature of which required his presence at the time and place where the offense occurred, and that thereafter he fled to asylum state is sufficient for purposes of extradition, even though demand does not expressly state that alleged fugitive was in demanding state at time of offense.

Application for requisition

Where the requisition, although not sworn to, stated that the person demanded was charged with a crime, and represented that he had fled to Ohio, and was accompanied by the application for the requisition, sworn to by a prosecuting attorney of the demanding state and indicating that such person was a fugitive, the requisition was not objectionable because not accompanied by sworn evidence that the person demanded was a fugitive.

within, or preëmpted by, the federal statutes.^{47.5} Where that fact otherwise appears, however, an express averment thereof is not required in the requisition or demand itself,^{47.10} and hence it is sufficient where that fact appears in the required accompanying papers,^{47.15} as in a copy of the indictment or other pleading charging the person demanded with the commission of a crime.^{47.20}

It is also necessary for the requisition or demand to show that the person demanded is charged with the commission of a crime,^{47.25} or that prosecution has been begun in the demanding state before some court or magistrate,⁴⁸ or that the person demanded has been convicted of crime in the demanding state and has broken his parole,^{48.5} or that he has escaped from confinement or has broken the terms of his bail, probation, or parole,^{48.10} and that the accused has fled from justice, or from the state,^{48.15} or, in other words, that the person demanded is a fugitive from justice.⁴⁹ It is not necessary that an affidavit accompanying the requisition papers for the purpose of showing that the person demanded was a fugitive should state the facts or elements of the crime charged.⁵⁰

On the other hand, the requisition need not allege the presence of the person demanded in the demanding state where the crime for which extradition is sought is the commission of an act in the asylum state, or in a third state, resulting in a crime in the demanding state,^{50.5} as where the crime

tice is absent where his identity is not disputed.^{52.20}

c. Second Requisition

A second requisition may issue on the original application where the person demanded is not found in the state on which requisition is made, and a refusal to honor a requisition will not bar subsequent extradition proceedings on the same grounds.

Where the person demanded is not found in the state on which requisition was made, but is ascertained to be in another and different state, the governor may issue a second requisition on the original application.⁵³ A refusal to honor a requisition is not such an adjudication of the merits as bars the institution of another extradition proceeding on the same grounds,⁵⁴ the second requisition need not show any change of circumstances since the rejection of the first demand.⁵⁵

by affidavit accompanying the application for extradition is insufficient.^{56.15}

Statutory requirements with respect to copies of papers charging a crime in the demanding state accompanying the demand for extradition or requisition are mandatory.^{56.20} The required papers are necessary in order to confer jurisdiction on the governor of the asylum state,^{56.25} and a requisition unaccompanied by such a paper is no justification for the arrest of a fugitive.⁵⁷ The indictment or affidavit need not be annexed to the requisition if it accompanies it,⁵⁸ and the mere recital that an indictment is annexed is of no avail, there being in fact none attached.⁵⁹

Duplicate copy for fugitive. A statutory provision requiring duplicate copies of the indictment, information, affidavit, or judgment of conviction or sentence and other instruments accompanying the demand or requisition to be furnished and delivered to the fugitive or his attorney is directory.^{59.10} The right conferred, however, is a valuable right and it becomes mandatory on demand.^{59.15}

In general, the document accompanying the requisition and setting forth the crime with which the person demanded is charged may be a copy of a criminal pleading other than an indictment or affidavit before a magistrate, such as an information or complaint, or a copy of the judgment of conviction or sentence.

The extradition provisions of the federal Constitution and statutes do not cover the whole ground relative to extradition between states, and ordinarily are held not to preclude the states from providing that the document accompanying the requisition and setting forth the crime charged may be a copy of a criminal pleading other than an indictment or affidavit before a magistrate.^{59.50} Thus, although it has been held that within the field covered by the federal statutes a state cannot require some instrument, such as an information, instead of an indictment or affidavit,^{59.55} generally any method prescribed by the demanding state for the institution of a criminal proceeding and which may be the basis for the issuance of a warrant of arrest satisfies the federal requirements with respect to the accompanying copy of an indictment or affidavit charging a crime.^{59.60}

Under various statutes, including the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, in addition to a copy of an indictment or affidavit made before a magistrate, as discussed supra § 14(1), the required accompanying documents showing the person demanded to be charged with a crime may be a copy of an information supported by affidavit,^{59.65} or of a warrant supported by an affidavit made before a committing magistrate,^{59.70} or of a judgment or conviction,^{59.75} or of a judgment of conviction or sentence imposed in execution thereof.^{59.80}

Information. An information has been held a sufficient instrument to support a requisition where the mode of procedure in the demanding state is by information and not by indictment, in some of the jurisdictions the courts holding a copy of an information to be a valid substitute for a copy of an indictment and in other jurisdictions the statutes expressly authorizing such a procedure,⁶⁰ especial-

Form of charge as immaterial

In extradition proceedings, whether instrument charging accused with crime is affidavit, or complaint or information under oath, is immaterial. Minn.—State v. Murnane, 215 N.W. 863, 172 Minn. 401.

In New York

(1) Formerly the lower courts were divided with respect to the sufficiency of an information to support a requisition. Some held that an extradition proceeding may be predicated on an information where the law of the demanding state authorizes prosecution by that method, and that an information constitutes a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the federal statutes. N.Y.—People ex rel. MacSherry v. Enright, 184 N.Y.S. 248, 112 Misc. 568, affirmed 188 N.Y.S. 945, 196 App. Div. 964.

(2) Others held that a state has the right to provide by statute for extradition on the basis of an information and that under the statutes of New York extradition was authorized on the basis of an information where the law of the demanding state provides for prosecution by information.

N.Y.—People ex rel. Hollander v. Britt, 92 N.Y.S.2d 662, 195 Misc. 722, affirmed 93 N.Y.S.2d 704, 276 App. Div. 815.

(3) On the other hand, it was also held that an information is not a substitute for an indictment within the requirements of the federal statute, and that it would not support a requisition even though a state statute expressly authorized it, because the requirements of the federal statute were exclusive and controlling. N.Y.—People ex rel. Lipshitz v. Bes-senger, 75 N.Y.S.2d 392, 273 App. Div. 19.

(4) This conflict of authority was resolved by a decision of the court of appeals which, while stating that there is merit in the view that an information is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the federal statute, based its decision that an information is a proper instrument to sustain a requisition on the theory that the federal statutes are not exclusive and the state legislature had expressly authorized such a procedure.

N.Y.—People ex rel. Matochik v. Barker, 114 N.E.2d 194, 306 N.Y. 32.

(2) Since the enactment of that statute, an information supported by an affidavit is sufficient, where there is an affirmative showing in the record that the law of the demanding state authorizes prosecution of the offense charged on an information.

Tex.—Ex parte Peairs, 283 S.W.2d 755, 162 Tex.Cr. 243, appeal dismissed Peairs v. State of Texas, 76 S.Ct. 104, 350 U.S. 858, 100 L.Ed. 762.

(3) Where evidence of laws of demanding state authorizing a prosecution for felony on an information is introduced in extradition proceeding, order of extradition is proper. Tex.—Ex parte Cooper, Cr., 308 S.W. 2d 22.

(4) Where, however, there is no showing that prosecution of offenses on an information is authorized in

ly where there has been a conviction and sentence,^{60.5} and there are dicta by the United States supreme court bearing out this view.⁶¹

In other cases, however, it has been held that an information cannot be regarded as a substitute for the affidavit permitted by statute where it is unverified,^{61.5} or where it is not verified by one having knowledge of the facts,⁶² but that a properly verified information may reasonably be construed to come within the provision for a charge by affidavit,^{62.5} and that where there is an attempt to rely on an information properly subscribed under oath, it must be accompanied by an affidavit made before a magistrate.^{62.10} Congress or the states, if they see fit to do so, have power under the federal constitutional provision governing extradition to include an information, verified or unverified, as a proper document to accompany the requisition.^{62.15}

An information is insufficient under a statute providing that where the charge is the commission of an act in the asylum, or a third, state resulting in a crime in the demanding state it must be contained in an indictment.^{62.20} Where the procedure of the demanding state requires an indictment for the prosecution of a felony, an information containing sworn statements made on information and belief is insufficient.^{62.25}

Under a statute authorizing the required document accompanying the demand to be an information supported by affidavit, the affidavit need not be made before a magistrate,^{62.30} and the information need not be based on the affidavit,^{62.35} which may be sworn subsequently to the date of the information.^{62.40}

Complaint. It has been stated generally that a complaint charging a crime is sufficient to support a requisition.^{62.45} In other instances, however, it has been held that while a preliminary complaint or affidavit, where verified, is sufficient to support a requisition,⁶³ it is not sufficient when not sworn the demanding state, it will not be sufficient.

Conviction or sentence. It has been held that a judgment of conviction is not a substitute for an affidavit or indictment and will not support a requisition,⁶⁵ but there is authority that a judgment of conviction will support an extradition proceeding,⁶⁶ even though the criminal proceeding was instituted by an unverified information.⁶⁷

Warrant. A warrant of arrest, it has been held, does not meet the requirement of an indictment or affidavit and will not support a requisition.⁶⁸ Other authority, however, has held that a warrant which sufficiently charges a crime is sufficient and is in effect an indictment under the extradition laws, where it was issued by a judge acting as a one-man grand jury and is a sufficient instrument in the demanding state on which to hold a person for trial.^{68.5}

Under some statutes, if the accompanying document is a copy of an affidavit made before a magistrate, it must also be accompanied by a copy of the warrant which was issued thereon.^{68.10} The federal Constitution and statutes, however, do not require the issuance by the demanding state of a warrant for the alleged fugitive, or the presentation of such a warrant with the requisition, in the event that one has been issued,^{68.15} and in various jurisdictions it is held that a writ or warrant of arrest need not be

§ 14(3). — Subsequent Filing of Indictment or Other Pleading

A requisition based on an affidavit sufficiently charging a crime is not rendered insufficient by the subsequent filing of an information or other criminal pleading charging the same crime.

A requisition based on an affidavit is valid even though subsequently an information is filed⁶⁹ or an indictment returned⁷⁰ charging the fugitive with the same crime. Where an indictment has been returned there is no necessity for basing a requisition on a mere affidavit,^{70.5} and in such case, where a copy of the indictment accompanies the requisition, an earlier affidavit made by a complaining witness need not be attached to and accompany the requisition, and where it is included among the extradition papers it will be regarded as mere surplusage.^{70.10}

§ 14(4). — Affidavit Taken before Magistrate

Under the federal and various state extradition statutes, an affidavit in support of a requisition must be taken before a magistrate, who, although not required to be a judge of a court of general jurisdiction, must be clothed with power as a public civil officer.

Under the federal and various state extradition statutes, an affidavit in support of a requisition must be taken before a magistrate,⁷¹ but it has been held that that fact need not appear on the face of the affidavit.⁷² The magistrate required is one clothed with power as a public civil officer,⁷³ or a judicial officer having a summary jurisdiction in matters of a criminal or quasi-criminal nature.⁷⁴ He is not required to be a judge of a court of general jurisdiction of the state,^{74.5} but may be a justice of the peace,^{74.10} a police judge,^{74.15} or, generally, one who is regarded as a magistrate in the demanding state.⁷⁵

The requirement that the affidavit be taken before a magistrate does not mean that the magistrate must write the affidavit or administer the oath;⁷⁶ it is sufficient that the affidavit be made in the presence of the magistrate,⁷⁷ or that the affidavit be laid before him for appropriate action.⁷⁸ The affidavit referred to is the affidavit which must be made before the magistrate who issues the warrant of arrest.^{78.5} A complaint can be an affidavit within the

and it need not be in any particular form,⁸¹ as long as it makes clear the fact that the documents are what they purport to be.⁸² The federal statute for the authentication of public acts and judicial proceedings in the several states is not applicable in extradition proceedings,⁸³ and whether the papers are certified in accordance with the laws of the demanding state will not be considered.⁸⁴

The question of authenticity is one for the determination of the governor of the demanding state and his certificate to the fact is alone required,⁸⁵ and is conclusive,⁸⁶ or, at least, it makes a prima facie case that there has been a compliance with the requirements of law.^{86.5} In the absence of a showing that documents for extradition purposes, certified as authentic by the governor of the demanding state, are spurious, the certification of the governor is sufficient.^{86.10} Where a statute does not provide for the manner in which the complaint and supporting papers accompanying the demand or requisition should be authenticated, the fact that they were not transmitted with demand in a single document connected by ribbon and seal will not render their authentication insufficient, particularly where there is no showing of any errors among the documents which could have affected the rights of accused.^{86.15} A statute requiring proof of execution of a written instrument when denied by the opposite party under oath has been held not to apply to extradition proceedings.⁸⁷

Where the requisition and accompanying documents are duly authenticated by the governor of the demanding state in conformity with the requirements of the federal statute, the fact that the petition for extradition filed with the governor of the demanding state was not verified by affidavit, as required by state statute, will not enable the fugitive to avoid extradition.^{87.5}

Although all reasonable presumptions are indulged to sustain the sufficiency of the instrument by which the crime is charged,^{89.5} and doubts as to its sufficiency are to be resolved in favor of the demanding state,⁹⁰ extradition should be refused where it shows that no crime was committed,^{90.5} or wholly fails in any of the fundamental elements of the crime indicated,^{90.10} even though it is legally possible to amend it so as to make it charge an offense.^{90.15} An instrument which charges a crime in futuro is insufficient for extradition purposes.^{90.20} A charge made substantially in the language of the statute of the demanding state defining the crime is sufficient.⁹¹ Mere irregularities in the extradition papers, or reversible errors existing before conviction, cannot prevent extradition, although it is otherwise where the verdict and judgment are void on their face and are nullities.^{91.5}

With respect to extradition, the demanding state has the power to determine what acts shall be crimes and to establish the forms of its process and pleadings.⁹² The validity of a statute defining a crime⁹³ or the constitutionality of the practice of the demanding state⁹⁴ may not be made the subject of inquiry in the asylum state. Similarly the asylum state will not consider alleged defects in the procedure in instituting criminal charges or in applying to the governor of the demanding state to institute extradition proceedings.⁹⁵

§ 14(7). — — Indictment and Affidavit Contrasted

Where extradition is sought on the basis of an affida-

It has been held that, where extradition is sought on affidavits, they will be more critically examined than will an indictment to see whether the facts alleged constitute a crime,¹ since the finding of an indictment presupposes the testimony of witnesses before a grand jury and is thus a safeguard against a removal that is wanton or ignorant.² An affidavit, however, while it must distinctly charge an offense,^{2.5} need not satisfy the requirements of a pleading,^{2,10} or have the technical exactness of an indictment,³ or provide proof sufficient to convict the person informed against.^{3,5}

Where the proceeding is based on an affidavit, the affidavit must contain facts from which the governor of the asylum state may determine that there is probable cause to believe that the person demanded committed the crime with which he is charged; it should set forth the facts and circumstances relied on to prove the crime, or it must set out the alleged crime with sufficient explicitness to apprise the governor who receives it of the facts which constitute the offense,⁴ while an indictment is prima facie evidence of probable cause.⁵

The affidavit required is one stating facts which would be admissible as evidence and sufficient to warrant a finding of probable cause to believe the person demanded committed the crime charged,⁶ and with such certainty as would justify a magistrate in the state on which the demand is made in committing the accused for trial therein.⁷ An affidavit by an incompetent affiant is tantamount to no affidavit and will not be sufficient to authorize a person's extradition.^{7,5}

Since the finding of an indictment is prima facie evidence that the acts charged constitute a crime,⁸ it need not state such fact specifically,⁹ nor need it be accompanied by the statutes of the demanding

§ 14(8). — — Pleadings on Information and Belief

An affidavit charging the person demanded with a crime is sufficient where it is full, definite, and specific and is made on knowledge and not on information and belief, but if it is based on information and belief it is insufficient, unless it states the source of the information and the grounds of belief.

An affidavit which appears to be full, definite, and specific, and is made on knowledge and not on information and belief, is sufficient.¹² On the other hand, although it has been held not necessary that the affidavit show personal knowledge on the part of the affiant,^{12.5} other authority has held that the affidavit should state facts of affiant's own knowledge,^{12.10} or should be under the oath or affirmation of some person familiar with the facts and circumstances which are set forth with sufficient definiteness to justify the testimony as to their truthfulness,^{12.15} and that it should not be the mere verification of a court paper by a public official who makes no claim to personal information of the matter stated.^{12.20}

§ 14(9). — Time and Place of Crime; Identity of Criminal

The pleadings charging the crime for which extradition is sought, a copy of which is required to accompany the requisition, must show the identity of the person demanded and that the crime charged was committed in the demanding state, but an averment of an inaccurate or vague date on which the crime was committed will not render them insufficient.

The pleadings charging the crime for which extradition is sought, a copy of which is required to accompany the requisition, must show that the crime charged was committed in the demanding state.¹⁷

Generally, the date on which the crime is charged to have been committed is not material in extradition proceedings,^{17.5} and hence a charge is not insufficient because the crime is alleged to have been committed on or about a specified date,^{17.10} or because the date as of which it asserts the crime was committed is not correct,¹⁸ unless time is an essen-

Court term

Indictment was not invalid because it recited that it was returned at July term, while alleged larceny, if committed, was committed in October, since court would assume that July term ran past that date.
Miss.—Tyler v. Pierce, 61 So.2d 309, 216 Miss. 498.

Year of crime

(1) That complaint charged crime to have been committed one year after true date did not make extradition proceedings void, where limitation was not involved and complaint did not show crime was committed after presentment of indictment or filing of complaint, especially where accused admitted presence in demanding state on true date of crime.

- Tex.—Ex parte Morris, 101 S.W.2d 259, 131 Tex.Cr. 596, certiorari denied Morris v. Davis, 57 S.Ct. 930, 301 U.S. 700, 81 L.Ed. 1355.

(2) In extradition proceeding, it was immaterial that because of clerical mistake indictment charged that alleged fugitive deserted minor children on certain day of year 1937 instead of 1936, since under such allegation state could prove offense to have been committed at any time during period covered by limitations.
Okl.—Ex parte George, 73 P.2d 471, 63 Okl.Cr. 115.

(3) Petitioner was not entitled to discharge because of admission that petitioner was not in latter state on date laid in indictment as that of robbery, in view of affidavits and state's attorney's statement in verified petition to governor of demanding state that crime was committed on same day of same month in preceding year.

tial element of the offense.¹⁹ An indictment charging the person demanded with nonsupport of his wife on a certain day has been held not to authorize his extradition where it appears that he has paid in full for her support up to that date.^{19.5}

An indictment has been held to be sufficient, even though it did not state when the crime was committed²⁰ or asserts that it occurred at an impossible time.²¹ Thus, even if it is shown that the person charged was not physically present in the demanding state on the date alleged in the indictment or complaint, he may be extradited if the evidence tends to show that the offense was committed at another time and the person demanded was present in the demanding state at the time when it was committed.^{21.5} Where, however, extradition of a person is sought for commission of a crime within a demanding state, the date of the offense must appear either in the indictment or other papers accompanying the requisition, or by testimony, in order that a prima facie case of fugitivity may be made out.^{21.10}

Identity of criminal. A charge is not insufficient as a basis for extradition in that it does not allege the fugitive's true name; all that is necessary is that it appear that the fugitive is the particular person charged or intended to be charged;²² but it has been held that a charge will not support a requisition where it does not name or describe the person so that he can be identified.²³ The governor of the asylum state or of the demanding state, however, may not insert in the requisition any name other than that which appears on the face of the indictment or affidavit.²⁴

- a. In general
- b. Proof
- c. Matters considered
- d. Hearing and notice

a. In General

On the presentation of a requisition for a fugitive from justice, the governor of the asylum state must determine that the person demanded is substantially charged with a crime and is a fugitive from justice.

fact.²⁹ If the governor resolves these questions against the person demanded, extradition should be granted.^{29.5} The governor, however, cannot be compelled to grant extradition.^{29.10}

Where extradition is sought for acts committed in the asylum or a third state resulting in a crime in the demanding state, the governor, before he grants extradition, must determine that such acts were committed and in addition any other matters required by the laws of the asylum state, such as that the acts for which extradition is sought would be punishable by the laws of the asylum state;^{29.15} and under some statutes, where extradition is sought on such grounds the governor, in his discretion, is authorized to attach conditions to the surrender of the person demanded.^{29.20} In such case, extradition

Presence in demanding state

Question whether the person demanded was present in the demanding state at the time of the commis-

Under various statutes, the governor may call on the attorney general or other prosecuting officer in the state to investigate a demand for extradition,^{33.5} and under such a statute the governor may consider evidence outside the papers sent with the requisition.³⁴ He is not required, however, to have such an investigation made,^{34.5} and where he does he is not required to follow the advice and report of the attorney general.^{34.10}

As it is to the requisition a governor looks for authority to issue his warrant,³⁵ no copy of the laws of the demanding state need be submitted to him to prove that the requisition is properly founded.³⁶ He, however, may take notice of the laws of the demanding state without proof thereof being submitted to him.³⁷ The certificate of the governor of the demanding state that the alleged fugitive is charged with a crime is worthy of consideration and entitled to weight,^{37.5} or it is prima facie proof of that fact,³⁸ but it is not conclusive.^{38.5} The record of an unsatisfied judgment of conviction is sufficient evidence that the person demanded is charged with a crime.^{38.10}

That person demanded is fugitive from justice.

The governor may consider any proof which reasonably tends to establish either that the person demanded is or is not a fugitive from justice.^{38.15} He is entitled to act on a statement in an affidavit accompanying the requisition that the person demanded is a fugitive from justice,³⁹ but such an affidavit is not conclusive,⁴⁰ and may be refuted.^{40.5} It has been held, however, that mere recitals in the requisition, there being no statement in the affidavit that the person demanded was a fugitive from justice, are not sufficient to warrant the governor in acting.⁴¹

An affidavit in support of a requisition that the prisoner is a fugitive from justice will not be disregarded as the statement of a mere conclusion of law,⁴² but the conclusion is one of fact to which a witness may be allowed to testify.⁴³ The fact that a man is charged with crime in one state and is afterward found in another has generally been regarded as prima facie evidence that he is a fugitive,⁴⁴ but it may be rebutted.⁴⁵

Generally it must be shown that the alleged offender was in the demanding state at the time of the commission of the crime,^{45.5} but where it appears sion of the crime may, but need not, be investigated by the officials of the asylum state.

N.Y.—People ex rel. Rankin v. Ruthazer, 107 N.E.2d 458, 304 N.Y. 302. Necessity that date of crime be alleged in pleadings, a copy of which is that he was in the demanding state in the neighborhood of the time the offense was allegedly committed, it is sufficient.^{45.10} Where the crime charged involves continuing acts, such as conspiracy to embezzle, the presence of the fugitive in the demanding state need not be on the exact date charged, but it is sufficient if he was present on any of the dates alleged in the indictment of the demanding state.^{45.15} If the record presents merely contradictory evidence on the question of the presence of accused in, or his absence from, the demanding state, a warrant properly issues.^{45.20} The fact that it appears from the indictment or other pleading charging the crime that the offenses were committed more than the number of years prescribed as the limitation period before the finding of the indictment does not preclude a finding that accused was a fugitive from justice.⁴⁶ The determination of the governor of the asylum state that the person demanded is a fugitive from the demanding state is prima facie correct.^{46.5}

Proof of identity. In extradition proceedings before the governor of the asylum state or his representative, the asylum state does not have the burden of affirmatively establishing the identity of accused with the person named in the requisition papers where such matter is not made an issue in the hearing.^{46.10}

c. Matters Considered

In general, the character of the crime charged to have been committed, the guilt or innocence of the person demanded, or the motives underlying the demand for extradition are not matters to be considered in determining whether or not extradition should be granted; but it has been held within the discretionary power of the governor of the asylum state to refuse extradition where it is sought for some ulterior purpose.

The governor of an asylum state has been held to act in an executive, and not in a judicial, capacity in granting extradition.^{46.50} The only question for his consideration is whether the person demanded is within the provisions of the statutes providing for extradition.^{46.55} He is not concerned with the character of the crime charged to have been committed,⁴⁷ nor will there be any inquiry into the motives underlying the demand,⁴⁸ or the guilt or innocence, or criminal liability, of the person demanded,⁴⁹ except as such an inquiry may be material in required to accompany requisition, see supra § 14 (9).

Customary method of proof

Whether person in custody is a fugitive is usually determined by the governor on proof satisfactory to him that accused was present in demanding state on date when offense is alleged to have occurred.

Assumption of good faith

In determining validity of requisition for a fugitive, it must be assumed that sister state, in asking the return of one properly accused of committing a crime in such state, does so in good faith and for proper motives.

Utah.—Moreaux v. Ferrin, 100 P.2d 560, 98 Utah 450.

Act of sovereign state

An extradition requisition is the act of a sister state having equal sovereignty to the asylum state, and not the act of some creditor or person holding a selfish private motive who may have instigated the prosecution.

Purpose of restriction

Purpose of statutory provision prohibiting inquiry into guilt or innocence of accused is to restrict such inquiry to the state which has jurisdiction of the crime charged.

Pa.—Commonwealth ex rel. Hatton v. Dye, 96 A.2d 127, 373 Pa. 502.

Immaterial attack

(1) Extradition is not based on guilt, but solely on the fact that the accused is charged with crime, and any attack on extradition proceedings which is based on the claimed innocence of accused is wholly immaterial.

W.Va.—Cassis v. Fair, 29 S.E.2d 245, 126 W.Va. 557, 151 A.L.R. 233.

(2) Affidavits which attempted to bolster charge against accused made by complaining witness who signed a criminal complaint on which justice court of demanding state issued warrant of arrest were wholly unnecessary to determination by governor of asylum state as to whether extradition should be issued, because they were an attempt to offer proof of guilt of the accused, and fact that affidavits were not executed before a magistrate would not invalidate extradition warrant.

Ariz.—Ex parte Rubens, 238 P.2d 402, 73 Ariz. 101, certiorari denied Rubens v. Boies, 73 S.Ct. 50, 344 U.S. 840, 97 L.Ed. 653.

Insanity

In extradition proceeding, evidence of present insanity of alleged fugitive could not be presented.

Ohio.—State ex rel. Davey v. Owen, 12 N.E.2d 144, 133 Ohio St. 96, 114 A.L.R. 686.

Fugitive on parole

(1) Since conviction was a necessary precedent to granting of parole, the fact that relator was at large physically instead of being in durance when he forfeited his right to clemency was a matter with which the governor of asylum state need not concern himself, the right to requisition being based on the unsatisfied judgment of conviction, not on violation of parole.

Mo.—Albright v. Clinger, 234 S.W. 57, 290 Mo. 83.

(2) Fact that alleged fugitive from justice was out of prison after conviction for a felony under parole would not preclude extradition, since demanding state had right to fix conditions of parole and had right to determine whether conditions had been violated.

Tex.—Ex parte Brower, 218 S.W.2d 463, 153 Tex.Cr. 175.

(3) In extradition proceedings based on fact that prisoner had violated his parole, whether the prisoner had in fact violated his parole was of no concern in the courts of the asylum state.

Colo.—Tinsley v. Woods, 313 P.2d 1006, 135 Colo. 590.

(4) Under the Interstate Parole Compact law, when the return to the demanding state is sought of an alleged parole violator, it need only be shown that he is the same person described in the papers, and that the officers from the demanding state are authorized persons.

N.Y.—People ex rel. Rankin v. Ruth-azer, 107 N.E.2d 458, 304 N.Y. 302.

Limitation of issues held proper

Governor of asylum state was held to have properly limited hearing to identity of person demanded and to have properly refused to investigate his guilt or innocence, even though there was a dispute whether charge against accused was in the form of an indictment or merely a complaint in a justice of the peace court, and even though accused maintained that charge against him was motivated by malice.

tations,⁵¹ but it has been held that the governor should refuse the demand where it clearly appears that prosecution for the crime charged is barred by limitations.⁵²

Consideration should not be given to, or extradition refused on the ground of, alleged mistreatment of prisoners in the demanding state, or an assertion that the person demanded will suffer cruel and inhuman treatment if he is returned thereto,^{52.5} or his fear of physical injury or of being lynched,^{52.10} or his claim that he has been wronged as a result of public hysteria directed at persons connected with communism,^{52.15} or a mere suggestion that the fugitive, because of his race and color, will not be fairly and justly dealt with in the state to which it is sought to remove him, or will not be adequately protected against violence.⁵³

Generally, however, it is within the discretionary power of the governor of the asylum state to refuse extradition where it is sought for some ulterior purpose,^{53.5} as for the purpose of collecting private debts^{53.10} or gratifying personal malice.^{53.15} It has been said that there is no satisfactory reason why a governor should issue a warrant where he is satisfied that the sole object of the party complaining is to enforce payment of a private claim for money.⁵⁴

Insanity. It is proper for the executive of the asylum state, in determining whether he will surrender a citizen of that state as a fugitive from justice, to consider that accused has been found to be a lunatic by the court of the asylum state, that a committee has been appointed for the custody of his person, and a place for his detention has been designated.⁵⁵

Identity. Since the question of identity of the person arrested as the one demanded does not arise until after an arrest on the governor's warrant, it is not for the governor to determine,⁵⁶ but the governor must decide whether the person sought is the same as the one alleged to be a fugitive from justice.⁵⁷

not subject to the rules of judicial procedure.^{58.5} The executive of the asylum state may act on the requisition in the absence of accused,⁵⁹ and without previous notice to him.⁶⁰ A statute providing for the furnishing to accused of copies of the complete set of instruments accompanying the requisition has been held to be directory only, and to become mandatory only when a request for them has been made by the alleged fugitive.^{60.5}

The person demanded is not entitled to a hearing before the governor of the asylum state,⁶¹ although the governor, in his discretion, and as a matter of grace, may grant him one.⁶² If the governor grants a hearing, it may be in such mode and manner as he deems satisfactory.^{62.5} It need not be conducted by the governor,^{62.10} and a commissioner appointed to receive evidence and make a report may conduct it.^{62.15} It is immaterial that the hearing was held before the private secretary of the governor.⁶³

Where there are alternative methods by which extradition proceedings may be commenced in a state, one by direct application to the governor for a writ of extradition, and the other by complaint, under oath, to a judicial officer, a fugitive who moves to continue proceedings before a judicial officer and then requests and is granted a hearing on the writ filed with the governor thereby waives further proceedings in the court even though he questions the propriety of the executive to proceed while the court action is pending.^{63.5}

Governor entitled to disregard judicial hearing

Where accused was arrested and detained in Illinois on a complaint charging her with being a fugitive from justice in a sister state, which state, while fugitive complaint was pending, requisitioned accused's extradition, governor of Illinois was not precluded from disregarding the § 16. Warrant

- a. Authority to issue
- b. Requisites
- c. To whom issued and authority to execute
- d. Conclusiveness
- e. Revocation

a. Authority to Issue

As a general rule the governor of the asylum state or territory has exclusive, nondelegable authority to issue the warrant, and the issuance authorizes the arrest and surrender of the accused person.

A warrant by the governor of the asylum state is indispensable to extradition,^{63.50} and the authority to issue the warrant rests exclusively in the governor of the asylum state⁶⁴ or territory.⁶⁵ Under some state statutes, however, a further proceeding before a court may be necessary before the alleged fugitive may be surrendered to the demanding state in accordance with the warrant.⁶⁶

The governor cannot delegate this authority;⁶⁷ but he may ratify a warrant already issued in his name and in his official capacity by a secretary or other assistant.⁶⁸ Unless so required by the statute, the governor need not sign the warrant with his own hand; it is only required that he make the decision and direct or cause the issuance of the warrant.⁶⁹

A governor has no inherent powers of arrest and surrender and he cannot proceed as a volunteer in extradition matters, but in issuing a warrant is limited to acting pursuant to a demand or request from a sister state,^{69.5} and then only in strict conformity with the law.^{69.10} Thus, a warrant which is not in accordance with the requisition is wholly ineffectual for any purpose.^{69.15} However, the

Acting governor

(1) Rendition warrant, which was not signed by governor of state from which relator was being extradited, was not defective in absence of showing that acting governor signed warrant while either governor or lieutenant governor was capable of performing duties of governor.

69.5 Colo.—Matthews v. People, 314 P.2d 906, 136 Colo. 102.

Necessity for requisition or demand see supra § 13 a.

Essential jurisdictional fact

Jurisdictional fact essential to the issuance by governor of a warrant for the arrest and extradition of a fugitive from justice wanted by another state to answer to a criminal charge was a demand from the governor of the demanding state accompanied by a copy of the indictment charging the criminal offense authenticated by the governor of the demanding state.

Ky.—Oakley v. Franks, 159 S.W.2d 415, 289 Ky. 605.

Basis of proceedings

Warrant of the governor of an asylum state merely implements extradition proceedings which are based on a requisition from the demanding state.

Colo.—Self v. People, 297 P.2d 887, 133 Colo. 524.

Authentication

(1) Rendition warrant based on documents not certified as authentic by the executive authority of the demanding state would be void.

Fla.—Schriver v. Tucker, 42 So.2d 707.

(2) Extradition proceeding was invalid where extradition warrant failed to allege that accused was present in demanding state at time of commission of alleged crime and that thereafter he fled from the state, and none of the papers constituting extradition warrant were authenticated by executive authority making the demand.

Pa.—Commonwealth ex rel. Thomas v. Superintendent Philadelphia County Prison, 94 A.2d 732, 372 Pa. 595.

(3) Evidence established that governor of asylum state had before him and acted on requisition from governor of demanding state and the papers, including authenticated copy of complaint charging person demanded with commission of a felony, thereto annexed, at time of issuance of his warrants for arrest and removal of person demanded and that he did not act on duplicate copies.

mere fact that there may be recitals in the warrant which are at variance with the facts as stated in the requisition does not invalidate the warrant.^{69,20}

In issuing the warrant, the governor acts in his official character and capacity,⁷⁰ so that a warrant issued by him is not functus officio at the time of the arrest thereunder merely because his term of office expired after issuance of the warrant.⁷¹

The governor's warrant in extradition proceedings is authority for the arrest and surrender of the accused person,⁷² and it supersedes all pending statutory extradition proceedings against the person named in the warrant, if the proceedings are based on the same charge,⁷³ and takes priority over any other state process by which the fugitive is held.^{73,5} The warrant is under the governor's control as long as the fugitive has not been removed to the demanding state under the authority of the warrant.⁷⁴

Second warrant. The fact that an extradition warrant had been improvidently issued by the governor's secretary did not preclude the governor from thereafter issuing a proper warrant as against the contention that the subsequent warrant was not valid in the absence of a second request for its issuance.⁷⁵ So a prisoner who was arrested on an executive warrant for extradition was not entitled to his discharge because a second executive warrant based on the same charge was issued before the former proceeding had been finally disposed of, since the state is not precluded from instituting new or additional proceedings if it deems it advisable, in order to supplement those originally instituted.⁷⁶

If, however, subsequent to a hearing in a habeas corpus proceeding a new and different warrant is substituted for the original, the substituted warrant is void,^{76,5} and does not affect the rights of the person held for extradition.^{76,10}

Single warrant for two fugitives. The fact that the governor's warrant directs the arrest of two persons for extradition in a single warrant will not invalidate it.^{76,15}

b. Requisites

- (1) Language and contents in general
- (2) Statement of charge of crime
- (3) Statement of flight from justice
- (4) Recital or copy of requisition or papers accompanying it

(1) Language and Contents in General

The warrant must show on its face that there has been a compliance with the requirements of the laws, and it must ordinarily name the fugitive as in the requisition and in the indictment or affidavit; but there is no requirement of any particular form or language and mere technical faults will not invalidate it.

The warrant of the executive who surrenders a fugitive must show on its face that there has been a compliance with the requirements of the laws,⁷⁷ namely, that accused had been demanded by the executive of the state from which he fled, as a fugitive from justice; that such a demand was supported by a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made before a magistrate, charging the fugitive with having committed a crime; and that such copy of indictment or affidavit was certified by the executive of the demanding state to be duly authenticated.⁷⁸ The warrant need not recite the legal authority for action on the part of the governor of the asylum state, or the enabling statute under which he purports to act.^{78.5}

There is no requirement of any particular form or language,⁷⁹ and the warrant will not be invalid because it has technical faults which do not materially affect its clearness or purport,⁸⁰ although in an early case a warrant was held void because the seal was unintelligible.⁸¹

Ordinarily the governor has no right to insert any other name in his warrant than that designated in the requisition⁸² and in the indictment or affidavit on which it is based.⁸³ It has been held, however, that the name designated in the warrant is immaterial if the person arrested is in fact the identical person indicted or intended to be charged in the demanding state, the sole effect of such an error being to shift the burden of proof to the state as to identity;⁸⁴ but the warrant is invalid if the evidence does not establish the identity between the

(1) Recitals of warrant that accused was "charged by the transcript of the minutes" in Okaloosa county, Fla., of a certain crime, was insufficient to meet statutory requirement that accused must be shown to be lawfully charged by indictment or information or by affidavit made before magistrate in the demanding state with having there committed a crime under its laws.

Ala.—Watson v. State, 2 So.2d 470, 30 Ala.App. 184.

(2) Statement of Charge of Crime

The warrant must specify, at least substantially, the offense alleged to have been committed by the accused, and, while the offense must appear to be the same as that named in the indictment or affidavit, it need not be shown that the act charged is in fact a crime by the laws of the demanding state.

A warrant need not show on its face that the act charged as a crime in the requisition is in fact a crime by the law or statutes of the demanding state,⁸⁶ but it must specify the offense alleged to have been committed by accused,⁸⁷ and such offense must be the same as the one specified in the indictment or affidavit presented to the governor by the demand for extradition.⁸⁸ The offense need only be stated substantially.⁸⁹ The facts on which the indictment was based need not be set out in the warrant.⁹⁰ Where the crime with which the fugitive is charged involves a continuing act, the warrant is not insufficient for failure to recite the specific date or dates on which it was committed.^{90.5}

(3) Statement of Flight from Justice

The warrant need show only that the accused is demanded as a fugitive and the burden of showing that he is not a fugitive rests on the accused.

Although it was once apparently required that the warrant show that in the opinion of the executive issuing it accused was a fugitive from justice,⁹¹ it is now generally settled that it need show only that accused is demanded as a fugitive.⁹² The issuance of a warrant by the governor of the asylum state creates a presumption that accused is a fugitive from justice,^{92.5} and the burden of showing that he is not a fugitive rests on accused.⁹³

(4) Recital or Copy of Requisition or Papers Accompanying It

The warrant must show on its face, without resort to proof, that it was issued on an indictment or affidavit, but it need not recite the contents or effect of papers which accompanied the demand for extradition or set out a copy of the indictment or affidavit.

While the warrant must show on its face, without resort to proof, that it was issued on an indictment or affidavit,⁹⁴ it need not recite the contents or effect of papers which accompanied the demand for extradition.⁹⁵ So the warrant need not set out a copy of the indictment or affidavit accompanying the requisition,⁹⁶ nor need a certified copy thereof be attached,⁹⁷ nor need it recite that a copy of an indictment or affidavit accompanied the requisition.⁹⁸

If it appears that an affidavit did accompany the requisition the warrant need not set out the form of the affidavit,⁹⁹ and in such a case a recital in the warrant that the fugitive was charged by indictment is a mere immaterial clerical error.¹

It must, however, appear that an affidavit is a true affidavit and not a mere complaint,² and in an early case it was held that the executive warrant must show that the affidavit on which the requisition was made was executed before a magistrate or judicial officer,³ although there is also authority to the contrary.⁴ If a warrant is prima facie invalid because of the absence of the necessary allegations it is cured if accompanied by the affidavit which shows the facts.⁵ There is, moreover, no method

Amount of evidence

(1) Prima facie case established by extradition warrant issued by governor, reciting ample jurisdictional facts to establish that person sought is a fugitive from justice, can be overcome only by clear and convincing evidence or by evidence to convince beyond a reasonable doubt. Ariz.—Ex parte Riccardi, 203 P.2d 627, 68 Ariz. 180.

(2) Conflict of evidence is not sufficient to overcome presumption, created by warrant issued by governor of asylum state, that accused is wanted fugitive, and evidence to overcome such presumption must be overwhelming.

Md.—Mason v. Warden, Baltimore City Jail, 99 A.2d 739, 203 Md. 659 —State ex rel. Channell v. Murphy, 96 A.2d 473, 202 Md. 650, certiorari denied State of Md. ex rel. Channell v. Murphy, 74 S.Ct. 40, 346 U. S. 824, 98 L.Ed. 349.

Evidence held insufficient

Where evidence in extradition proceeding tended to show that relator, who was charged with abandonment and nonsupport in demanding state, had been guilty of the offense on dates other than the specific date charged, and there was no evidence that relator had been elsewhere than in that state on such dates, relator did not overcome burden of proving that he was not a fugitive from justice, notwithstanding he had shown he had not been in demanding state on specific dates charged.

Ill.—People ex rel. Goshorn v. Babb, 122 N.E.2d 239, 4 Ill.2d 114.

Conclusive evidence

Duly certified copy of an information charging relator with having committed the crime of burglary in the nighttime in demanding state, accompanied by sworn affidavits attesting to the commission of the crime charged, constituted a prima facie showing that relator was in that state when crime was committed, making it incumbent on relator to establish by conclusive evidence that he was not in demanding state when crime was committed and that he was not a fugitive from justice, in default of which proof extradition was proper.

(3) Warrant reciting that it was accompanied by copy of penitentiary commitment authenticated by governor of demanding state, although not referring to indictment or affidavit, was sufficient, it being presumed in support of warrant that commitment may have contained, in authentic manner, all the requisites to show that defendant was under conviction of an extraditable crime in demanding state, "commitment" being defined as authority for holding in prison one convicted of crime.

Presumption

Governor's rendition warrant issued for return of accused to demanding state which failed to recite that affidavits presented for its issuance were sworn to before a magistrate of that state was sufficient because prima facie valid under a presumption of official regularity.

of forcing an executive to produce for the benefit of accused the papers which accompanied the requisition if he does not desire to do so.⁶

If the governor has sufficient documentary evidence on which to issue a warrant, the fact that he did not see the transfer agent of the demanding state personally does not render the warrant objectionable.^{6,5}

c. To Whom Issued and Authority to Execute

Except where otherwise provided by statute, the warrant need not be directed to any named officer; but only an officer coming within the designation of the persons to whom the warrant is directed is authorized to make an arrest thereunder.

In the absence of any statutory requirement to the contrary, the warrant need not be directed to any named officer.⁷ It may be addressed to the sheriff of the county⁸ or to the agent of the demanding state,⁹ although state legislation on the subject is competent,¹⁰ and the requirements of such legislation must be complied with.¹¹ An officer who does not come within the designation in the warrant of the persons to whom it is directed has no authority to make an arrest thereunder.¹²

Where on judicial review of the extradition proceedings it is established that there was a sufficient demand for return of the prisoner but that the authority of the agent named to receive him was insufficiently shown, the court will remand the prisoner to custody to be delivered to an agent with proper authority.¹³

d. Conclusiveness

In the absence of proof to the contrary, it will be presumed that the governor acted in conformity with law in the issuance of his warrant, and the warrant or the recitals therein are prima facie evidence of the existence of the jurisdictional facts, although it is not conclusive proof of compliance with statutory requirements.

Quoted in: Cal.—Application of Fedder, 299 P.2d 881, 886, 143 C.A.2d 103.

Identity

(1) State, in extradition proceedings, establishes a prima facie case of identity of person as the wanted fugitive, from proof of the recital as to identity found in the governor's warrant, and the identity of name.

Ariz.—Ex parte Freeman, 291 P.2d 795, 80 Ariz. 21.

(2) Where no issue was made at extradition hearing as to prisoner's identity as being the person wanted in the demanding state, introduction in evidence of warrant of the governor of the asylum state made out a prima facie case.

Former presence in demanding state

U.S.—Daugherty v. Hornsby, C.C.A. Ga., 151 F.2d 799.

(2) Extradition warrant which contained requisite jurisdictional recitals, when exhibited with return of sheriff, made out a "prima facie case" for the prisoner's legal restraint, as against contention that warrant was fatally deficient because it failed to show that prisoner was present in demanding state when offense was committed.

Ala.—State v. Knight, 14 So.2d 159, 31 Ala.App. 174, certiorari denied 14 So.2d 161, 244 Ala. 430.

(3) In extradition proceeding, determination of whether or not prisoner was physically present in the demanding state at or about the time the offense of which he is charged is alleged to have been committed, requisition papers with their accompanying affidavits and the governor's warrant made a prima facie case.

Prima facie validity overcome

(1) In habeas corpus proceeding to obtain release from custody under rendition warrants, telegram and letter from sheriff of a parish in demanding state established that warrants on which petitioners had previously been arrested in another county were issued for the purpose of collecting a debt so that petitioners could not have been properly extradited thereon.

Ala.—King v. State, 56 So.2d 379, 36 Ala.App. 368.

(2) Where evidence presented at hearing shows that extradition warrant of governor was issued in a case not authorized by law, the prima facie case made by the warrant is overcome, and such rule applies where it is shown that alleged fugitive was not present in demanding state at time of commission of the alleged offense.

contained therein.¹⁷ The warrant is ordinarily not conclusive proof that the requirements of the statute were complied with before its issuance.¹⁸

The burden is on accused to come forward with evidence to overcome the prima facie case,^{18.5} or to prove he is entitled to discharge.^{18.10}

The refusal of the governor to allow accused to inspect the requisition and the accompanying documents, or to produce them or to furnish copies of them, will rebut the prima facie sufficiency of the warrant.¹⁹

(2) Prima facie case for detention of prisoner under rendition warrant containing jurisdictional facts was not overcome by complaints, warrants, and affidavits received in evidence, but which had only negative probative value in absence of requisition demand certifying them.

Ala.—Blanton v. State, 50 So.2d 786, 35 Ala.App. 561.

(3) Where warrant was based on affidavit, made before magistrate in demanding state, sufficiently charging crime of grand theft, prima facie validity of warrant could not be overcome by magistrate's indorsement on back of affidavit, warrant not being based on indorsement.

Fla.—Mitchell v. Stoutamire, 152 So. 629, 113 Fla. 822.

(4) Testimony of alleged fugitive was insufficient to overcome prima facie case established by extradition warrant.

In New York

(1) It was formerly the rule that the finding of the governor was final and that he could not be required to produce the evidence on which the warrant was issued.

e. Revocation

The governor may revoke a warrant of rendition as long as the alleged fugitive is still in the state of asylum, and he may vacate his order revoking the warrant.

If a warrant has been issued in a case in which it should not have been issued, the governor may revoke it whether it was issued by himself or his predecessor,²⁰ and this power exists regardless of any lapse of time between the granting of the warrant and its attempted revocation where the alleged fugitive remains within the state during the interim.²¹ On the other hand, the revocation to be effective must be issued before the alleged fugitive is taken from the asylum state.²²

The courts have on the ground of impropriety declined to review the action of the governor in revoking a warrant²³ or in refusing to revoke it.²⁴

The governor may vacate his order suspending the warrant and may order it redelivered for execution to the sheriff if he determines that the warrant was improperly suspended.²⁵

§ 17. Examination and Review of Proceedings by Courts

While as a general rule the action of the governor in according or refusing rendition of a fugitive cannot be controlled by the courts, whether there has been compliance with statutory requirements may be determined in a habeas corpus proceeding or, under some statutes, in a special judicial proceeding.

As a general rule, the action of the governor in according or refusing rendition of a fugitive from another state cannot be controlled by the courts.²⁶ Where it is claimed that the warrant of rendition is defective in itself, or was issued without compliance with the requirements of the statute, resort may be had to habeas corpus to secure the prisoner's discharge, as discussed in Habeas Corpus, § 39, and in the absence of special statutory provision there is no other method of securing judicial review of the extradition proceeding.²⁷ It is the right and duty of the proper judicial authorities of the asylum state to determine whether the person sought to be extradited is in fact charged with a crime in the demanding state,^{27.5} but the guilt or innocence of the person demanded may not be inquired into in any proceeding after the demand for extradition of the asylum state, except as it may be material in identifying the person charged or in determining whether he is a fugitive from justice.^{27.10} The fact that a compact between states does not allow the courts of the asylum state to review the decision of the demanding state to retake a paroled prisoner does not render the extradition invalid.^{27.15}

By some statutes, however, the warrant of arrest is returnable to a specified court or judge,²⁸ and

Jurisdiction

The common pleas court does not lack jurisdiction merely because the governor's warrant issued for the arrest of the person demanded does not appear among the extradition papers or is not introduced in evidence. Ohio.—In re Sanders, supra.

provision is made for an examination by him of the proceedings substantially the same as would be procured by an application for a writ of habeas corpus.²⁹ A statute requiring that, on the issue of a warrant of rendition, the prisoner be taken before a judge of a court of record and informed of his right to contest extradition by habeas corpus is designed to provide a judicial hearing to determine whether he should be surrendered,^{29.5} and the same purpose is accomplished under a section of the act providing for the arrest of a fugitive without a warrant which requires that he be taken before a judge or magistrate where his answer shall be heard as if he had been arrested on a warrant.^{29.10} The question whether accused should be adjudged a fugitive from justice can only be determined at the hearing accorded him by statute,^{29.15} and at such hearing accused may test the sufficiency of the requisition.^{29.20}

There is no constitutional obligation so to time the arrest of the person charged and so to conduct his deportation as to afford him a convenient opportunity, before some judicial tribunal sitting in the state of asylum, to test the question whether he was a fugitive from justice and as such liable to be extradited.³⁰

§ 18. Discharge and Rearrest

A person arrested on a demand for extradition is entitled to be discharged where the agent of the demanding state does not appear and take custody of him within the prescribed statutory time.

The effect as res judicata of the discharge on habeas corpus of an alleged fugitive arrested in extradition proceedings and the right to rearrest him are treated in extenso in another title.³¹⁻³⁶

Under the federal Constitution and statutes, a person arrested on a demand for extradition is entitled to be discharged if the agent of the demanding state does not appear and take custody of him within the prescribed statutory time,^{36.5} but such provisions do not apply so as to entitle him to be discharged where the delay is due to proceedings instituted to test the validity of his arrest.^{36.10} The arrest referred to is the arrest caused by the executive authority of the asylum state after formal demand has been made by the governor of the demanding state,^{36.15} and an arrest made prior to such formal demand or the issuance of an extradition warrant by the governor of the asylum state is not the arrest contemplated in computing the period after which the prisoner may be discharged.^{36.20} The limitation on the time a fugitive may be detained refers only to the length of time the detaining state may hold or detain him while waiting for the requesting state to come and pick him up,^{36.25} and the failure of the requesting state to pick him up within the prescribed time will not affect its right to have him returned.^{36.30}

Nature and scope of proceedings

Examining judge in extradition proceedings is not obliged to determine whether the person demanded is guilty of offense in demanding state, but only whether the demanding state has shown prima facie evidence, and has supported its requisition with proper formalities.

Ohio.—Milovich v. Langley, App., 121 N.E.2d 188—In re Sanders, App., 31 N.E.2d 246.

Burden of proof

The requisition papers make a prima facie case, and the state is not obliged to offer oral evidence in addition, so that the court may require accused to go forward with the evidence; where there is conflicting evidence on the question whether affidavits charging the offense were signed by prosecutrix through coercion and over-persuasion, the matter is for the examining judge, and his conclusion will not be disturbed on appeal.

Where an alleged fugitive was extradited to the demanding state and there discharged on motion of the state's attorney before accused was placed in jeopardy, such discharge does not prevent his arrest and extradition for the same offense on a second requisition.^{36.35}

§ 19. Bail

Although bail may be permitted in the discretion of the court where accused is held pending the arrival of a requisition, it is generally the rule, in the absence of contrary statute, that bail may not be given for a prisoner held under a warrant of rendition.

Power to grant bail in behalf of fugitives from justice who are held in custody by virtue of extradition proceedings is not inherent in the courts, but must arise by virtue of constitutional or statutory provisions.^{36.50}

Where an alleged fugitive is preliminarily detained to await an extradition requisition and warrant, he is, under some statutes, including the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, entitled to bail,³⁷ if the offense for which he is arrested is a bailable offense;^{37.5} but such a provision is applicable only while the person is being held to await requisition and before the warrant for his arrest is issued by the governor.^{37.10} It has also been held that the matter is one within the discretion of the court and that it is not mandatory to grant bail.³⁸

Where the fugitive is not detained awaiting a request from another state for his surrender, but is held on a warrant of extradition, according to the weight of authority, he is not, in the absence of statute authorizing it, entitled to bail.³⁹ Constitutional and statutory provisions granting persons charged with offenses against the laws of the state the right to bail have been held not applicable to persons arrested for interstate extradition proceedings.^{39.5}

Under some statutes, however, the admission to bail is within the judicial discretion of the court⁴⁰ or is a matter of right, where sought pending an appeal by an accused remanded to custody on a habeas corpus hearing.⁴¹ It has also been held that, where the charge is only a misdemeanor, the pristurned to it as a fugitive from justice by failing to show for convict within six months after his arrest in asylum state as a fugitive from justice at request of authorities of demanding state.

Majority rule

"Courts, with marked uniformity, have denied bail to a fugitive from justice, in extradition proceedings, after issuance of the warrant of extradition, although the fugitive sought bail incidentally to a writ of habeas corpus brought to test the legality of his detention under the executive warrant, and we regard their position as correct, since any inherent power of the courts in such cases to deal with the custody of the fugitive may be fully exercised by appropriate regulation of the form and manner of his custody."

oner may be entitled to bail as a matter of right unless his liberty would be a menace to the community.⁴²

A bail bond showing that defendant is held as a fugitive from justice in another state is not void as failing to show whether the charge was a misdemeanor or a felony.⁴³

Forfeiture of bond. The rules governing criminal cases generally with reference to forfeiture of appearance bonds are applicable to extradition cases.⁴⁴ If the person sought to be extradited absconds and fails to appear at the time fixed for appearance the bond is subject to forfeiture.^{44.5} In proceedings for forfeiture of a bail bond, the surety cannot go behind the warrant of the governor of the asylum state and test the sufficiency of the requisition of the demanding state,^{44.10} or raise defenses which accused might have raised at a hearing to test the sufficiency of the requisition.^{44.15}

§ 20. Authority and Liability of Agent to Receive Fugitive

An agent to receive a fugitive is an officer of the state whose governor appoints him and not of the United States, and the right by which he holds the prisoner may be inquired into by a state court, or by a federal court in so far as his actions exceed the authority given him by federal statutes.

In order that one may become an agent to receive a fugitive within the terms and meaning of the extradition laws there must be compliance with the federal Constitution and laws and any state laws in aid thereof, or not in conflict therewith.^{44.50} It is necessary that the governor of the demanding state make demand under such laws and that he appoint such person agent thereunder for the purpose of receiving and returning the person demanded.^{44.55} In the absence of any such agency, one who goes to another state to receive and return a fugitive is acting as a private citizen.^{44.60}

The agent, although his authority is derived from the laws of the United States, is an officer or agent of the state whose governor appoints him, and not of the United States.⁴⁵ His authority to hold a fugitive is prima facie proved by a precept from the governor who appoints him,⁴⁶ and his acts in declining to demand a fugitive or withdrawing a requisition will be presumed to be under instructions from his principal.⁴⁷ The right by which the agent holds a fugitive may be inquired into by a state court,⁴⁸ but he is subject to federal courts if he exceeds the authority given him by United States statutes.⁴⁹

The agent, as such, has nothing to do with securing the requisition from the governor of the demanding state, nothing to do with having it honored by the governor of the asylum state, and no duty to arrest and secure the fugitive.^{49.5} His duty is to conduct or transport the fugitive to the demanding state after the executive authority of the asylum state has delivered up such fugitive to him,^{49.10} and if he does this without unreasonable delay and acts within the scope of his authority he is not liable to an action for false imprisonment,⁵⁰ even if his feelings toward the prisoner are in fact malicious.⁵¹

An agent cannot defend the arrest of a fugitive by pleading a warrant bearing another name.⁵² Even if he tells a fugitive that payment of a debt might stop extradition this is not necessarily an

§ 21. Proceedings after Return

- a. In general
- b. Prosecution in another state

a. In General

Generally, the fact that one was extradited on a charge of a specific crime does not preclude his prosecution for other offenses without his having been given an opportunity to leave the state; but authority is divided as to whether the prisoner may be subjected to civil process while held by virtue of the extradition proceedings.

As a general rule, a fugitive from justice, surrendered by one state on the demand of another, is not protected from prosecution for offenses other than that for which he was surrendered, but may be tried for any crimes committed in the demanding state either before or after extradition without having been given an opportunity to leave the state.⁵⁵ Therefore, although he is tried for a different offense against his objection, no right, privilege, or immunity secured to him by the laws and Constitution of the United States is thereby denied.⁵⁶

Even under the view that the fugitive cannot be tried for a different crime, he may be tried for an included crime⁵⁷ or another crime growing out of the same transaction,⁵⁸ and has only a reasonable time within which to leave the state.⁵⁹

If a prisoner voluntarily signs a waiver of extradition process, or otherwise waives extradition, he cannot be heard to complain that he was brought to the demanding state without such process.^{59.5} In such case, he may be charged with and tried for other crimes,^{59.10} and his rights are not violated because the charge against him is raised to a higher degree,^{59.15} or where he pleads guilty to, and is sentenced on, other charges;^{59.20} and if he returns voluntarily, knowing that if he resists he will be extradited, he will not be protected from arrest on a second charge.⁶⁰ Where a resident of another state has been brought within the state on criminal process to answer for an offense alleged to have been committed while in the state of his residence, he will not, on his discharge before he has had an opportunity to return, be retained to answer for an act of omission since he was brought in the state unless the omission was conscious and willful on his part.⁶¹

Subjection to civil process. In some jurisdictions, sometimes under statute, such as the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, one accused of crime who has been brought within the state by requisition proceedings cannot, until he has been given a reasonable opportunity to depart therefrom, be served with civil process⁶² nor may accused be arrested on civil process.⁶³ This rule was followed where the criminal and civil actions were closely related,^{63.5} but the extradited person has been held not exempt from process where the criminal action was not instituted by the plaintiff in the civil suit nor did it arise out of the same facts as the criminal prosecution.⁶⁴

The privilege from arrest may be waived by accused.⁶⁵ Also, if the requisition was issued in order to obtain jurisdiction of accused in a civil suit, process procured by the fraud in this manner will be held void.⁶⁶ If it were known before his surrender that the requisition was issued in order to subject him to a civil suit, the governor who received it would have no authority to issue a warrant for his arrest.⁶⁷

Restraint as insane person. One who has been committed to an insane hospital and escapes therefrom to another state may, after his return and acquittal of the crime of conspiracy on a charge of which he was extradited, be returned to the insane hospital without being allowed a reasonable time within which to depart from the state.⁶⁸

Failure to furnish correct copy of affidavit. The fact that after the prisoner has been returned to the demanding state, copies of the affidavit made for the purpose of extraditing him, furnished his attorney by the prosecutor, are not exact copies of the one filed with the governor of the demanding state is immaterial where there is no showing that the attorney for the prisoner did not have time to secure a correct copy, or that any information was withheld from them, or that the prosecution knew the copy furnished was not correct, and there is no claim that a correct copy would have aided in the cross-examination of the complaining witness.^{68.5}

Although there is some authority to the contrary, generally a state by honoring a requisition does not thereby waive its right subsequently to punish the prisoner for past delinquencies, or to extradite him for that purpose. A person who has been extradited may be re-arrested after discharge and surrendered to a third state on its demand.

As appears supra § 11, a person in custody for an offense in one state may be surrendered to another state which requests his extradition. Such surrender has been held to operate as a waiver of the jurisdiction of the state over the person of the prisoner,⁶⁹ and it has been held that he cannot thereafter be considered a fugitive from justice from the surrendering state so as to permit it to requisition him on termination of proceedings against him in the second state, and that it has waived its right to secure his return to answer for the offense for which he was originally held in custody.⁷⁰

Good faith

The fact that the criminal prosecution was instituted in good faith does not vary the rule to render valid service made on such nonresident witness so within the jurisdiction. Ohio.—Lotz v. Lotz, 23 Ohio N.P., N.S., 309.

Permanent waiver

Where a prisoner serving a sentence is extradited as a fugitive from justice and delivered to another state, jurisdiction over his person is forever waived by the asylum state. Ill.—People ex rel. Barrett v. Bartley, 50 N.E.2d 517, 383 Ill. 437, 147 A.L.R. 935.

Priority over state process

Waiver of jurisdiction of a state over a fugitive is a prerogative of the governor of the asylum state and his extradition warrant takes priority over all state process by which the fugitive is held.

Ill.—People ex rel. Barrett v. Bartley, supra.

Jurisdiction of court of requisitioning state

The court of the requisitioning state will not inquire into the regularity of the surrender, and it has no jurisdiction to determine whether, because of the fact that accused was under a felony charge in the state surrendering him, his surrender violated his rights to a speedy trial under the constitution of that state. Ill.—People v. Klinger, 149 N.E. 799, 319 Ill. 275, 42 A.L.R. 581.

Fugitive not entitled to object

Constitutional rights

Prisoner cannot be handed from one jurisdiction to another for trial, conviction, and service of a new sentence, before being returned to the asylum state for service of an unexpired sentence, without violating his constitutional rights.

According to other decisions, however, which have been stated to be the weight of authority,^{70.5} the return of a fugitive to another state does not constitute a waiver of jurisdiction by the state surrendering him subsequently to punish him for past delinquency,^{70.10} especially where there is an express reservation of the right of return of the prisoner in the extradition agreement.^{70.15} The surrendering state does not waive or forfeit any of its rights to regain the person surrendered for the purpose of trial, sentence, or punishment for any crime committed within the state.^{70.20} It may subsequently extradite the prisoner and have him brought back, where no indictment had been returned against him at the time of his surrender to the demanding state,⁷¹ or where the existence of his delinquency was not known at that time,⁷² or where he was awaiting trial in the asylum state for a criminal offense,^{72.5} or was serving a prison sentence,^{72.10} or where he is paroled or otherwise released before expiration of his sentence, and is thereupon surrendered to another state on request for his rendition.⁷³ After he has been brought back into the state from which he was originally extradited the prisoner may be confined in prison under a commitment in effect at the time he was originally extradited.^{73.5}

of the prisoner, the honoring of a requisition for one at liberty under a suspended sentence^{73.10} or pending an appeal from conviction⁷⁴ in the state of asylum does not satisfy the judgment against him, although it does operate as a waiver of the right thereafter to extradite him from the other state as a fugitive.

A person who has been brought into a state from another state under extradition proceedings, and has been discharged, may be rearrested and surrendered to a third state on its demand as a fugitive from its justice, without being allowed an opportunity to leave the state to which he had been extradited.⁷⁵ As the state to which a person has been illegally brought may hold him to answer for his offenses against it, it may arrest and surrender him on extradition proceedings to answer for his offenses against another state.⁷⁶

Right to object to completed extradition. A person who has been extradited from one state to another and then subsequently extradited and brought back to the first state cannot, after he is once again held by the first state, inquire into the legality of his extradition back into that state, or into the right of the first state to his custody after his commitment to a penal institution therein.^{76.5}

76.5 U.S.—Dean v. State of Ohio, D. C.W.Va., 107 F.Supp. 937.

§ 22. — Effect of Illegal Rendition

As a general rule, illegal rendition of a prisoner by one state to another does not exempt him from prosecution in the state against which he offended, although if the governor of the asylum state requests his release, he should, in comity, be discharged.

It is not, according to the generally accepted view, as discussed in Criminal Law § 146, a cause for exemption from prosecution for a crime that accused was illegally arrested in another state and unlawfully brought within the jurisdiction of the state against which he offended, although the contrary has been held; nor is he protected from prosecution even if he was kidnapped in the other state and brought into the state without a semblance of right. It follows, therefore, that he is within the jurisdiction of the court even though he was illegally arrested or surrendered on invalid extradition proceedings,⁷⁷ as where the requisition proceedings were not strictly legal.⁷⁸

The state from which he was wrongfully taken has no redress except to demand the extradition of the abductors that they in turn may be prosecuted by it;⁷⁹ but if the governor of the state from which a fugitive has been taken by artifice or force demands such fugitive's release the court of the state to which he is taken should, in comity, discharge him.⁸⁰ The defense that the prisoner is not a fugitive from justice must be raised before he is taken from the state to which he has fled,⁸¹ although there is also authority to the contrary.⁸²

Damages. Under the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, a person who claims to have been illegally arrested under a demand for extradition is not entitled to maintain a civil action for either civil or punitive damages.^{82.5}

§ 23. Costs and Expenses

The costs, expenses, and compensation for which agents may recover, the governmental unit primarily responsible for payment thereof, and the procedure for the allowance thereof, are determinable in accordance with applicable state statutes.

Under the terms of the federal statute, 18 U.S.C. A. § 3195, all costs incurred in apprehending, securing, and transmitting a fugitive must be paid by the demanding state.

The costs and expenses which agents may incur, and the amount of compensation recoverable for their services,⁸³ and the instances in which such expenses shall be borne by the state⁸⁴ and in which by the county,⁸⁵ are determinable from the provisions of the statutes of the various states governing such matters.

With respect to the allowance of expenses, the agent appointed by the governor to receive a fugitive, even though he is a deputy sheriff, or sheriff, acts as a special agent to extradite, and not as an officer of the court, or as sheriff under his bond, at least until he has the prisoner in his custody in his county.^{85.5} Hence, the fees provided by the state statute are recoverable notwithstanding the agent is at the same time the sheriff of the county where the crime was committed,⁸⁶ unless the governor appoints an agent to receive a fugitive on the express condition that the state shall not be responsible for the expenses incurred.⁸⁷

The statutory procedure prescribed for the presentation of claims for expenses and the allowance thereof should be followed, which, under some statutes, is by petition to a specified court, which court, after a hearing, enters an order allowing such expenses, if proper, and such order is then presented to the county board of supervisors and allowed by the board.^{87.5} Where members of the board of supervisors are not required to be made parties defendant to proceedings against the county for an order for issuance of a warrant for expenses of an agent in returning fugitives under the governor's requisition, a defect in a summons directed to the supervisors is immaterial,^{87.10} and the failure of the supervisors to appear in the proceeding and contest on behalf of the county is also immaterial.^{87.15}

Although the fees claimed by the agent are those allowed a sheriff for similar services and are reasonable, the state auditor cannot be compelled to issue a warrant therefor until after allowance by the governor;⁸⁸ but in these matters the governor acts merely as an auditing officer and may be compelled by mandamus to audit the account of an agent.⁸⁹ When an agent is appointed on condition that the arrest is to be made without expense to the state, he cannot collect from the state the expenses incurred by him in the matter.⁹⁰

Where under a statute complainant is liable for costs and charges for the weekly support of the prisoner, the jailer may discharge him for default in the payment thereof.⁹¹ The asking or receiving of a fee by an extradition agent may be made a misdemeanor by statute, to prevent abuses.⁹² The payment of costs by an injured person does not invalidate proceedings for extradition.⁹³

Unsuccessful proceedings

Agent named in requisition to reclaim fugitive in another state could not claim compensation for services where he did not return prisoner because governor of asylum state refused to honor requisition, notwithstanding governor of demanding state approved his claim.

Issues

On petition for mileage, etc., for returning fugitives under governor's requisition court can inquire only into question whether requisition was issued and prisoners returned, and question of actual mileage and other reasonably essential expenses.

Miss.—Kitchens v. Union County, supra.

Presentation of claim to district attorney for opinion

(1) Under statutes requiring petition to circuit court for allowance of mileage for returning fugitives and requiring district attorney's opinion before allowance of public accounts, judge must ask district attorney's advice before allowing such mileage, but claim therefor need not be first presented to district attorney.

Miss.—Kitchens v. Union County, supra.

(2) Although district attorney's opinion as to allowance of claim must be presented to court, its allowance is ultimately committed to judgment of court, and in court claim may be contested by district attorney on behalf of county.

Miss.—Kitchens v. Union County, supra.

(3) Where court does not obtain district attorney's opinion with respect to allowance of claim for expenses of agent, it has no authority either to allow or disallow claim, and in such situation judgment denying petition is tantamount merely to erroneous dismissal of claim and not a final judgment on merits.

III. INTERNATIONAL EXTRADITION

§ 24. Nature of Right

The right of a foreign power to demand the extradition of one accused of crime and the correlative duty to surrender him exist only when created by treaty; and in the United States, in the absence of statutory or treaty provision therefor, no authority exists in any branch of the government to surrender a fugitive criminal to a foreign government.

The right of a foreign power to demand the extradition of one accused of crime and the correlative duty to surrender him to the demanding country exist only when created by treaty.⁹⁴ There is no obligation on a government, under the law of nations, to surrender fugitive criminals to another government,⁹⁵ and where, in the absence of a treaty imposing such right and duty, such delivery is made, it is on the principle of comity, founded on the broad principle that it is to the interest of civilized communities that crimes acknowledged to be such should not go unpunished.⁹⁶ Under such circumstances the sovereign power on which demand is made may exercise its discretion and may investigate the charge on which the surrender is demanded.⁹⁷

In the United States it is well settled that, independent of statutory or treaty provision, no authority exists in any branch of the government to surrender a fugitive criminal to a foreign government,⁹⁸ and mere desirability of providing for extradition is not a substitute for constitutional authority.⁹⁹ Power to extradite a national must be found in the statute or treaty conferring the power; it is not enough that the statute or treaty does not deny the power to surrender.¹ In 1864, however, Mr. Seward, secretary of state of the United States, with the sanction of President Lincoln, directed the arrest of a fugitive from Cuba as a purely executive act in a case in which this country had no extradition treaty with the country from which the criminal had fled.²

As the United States does not surrender fugitive criminals in the absence of treaty stipulation, its practice is to decline to request extradition from a foreign government with which this government has no treaty providing for surrender,³ although there are isolated cases in which this government has requested of foreign governments the surrender of fugitive criminals as an act of comity, but in these cases the request has always been accompanied by the statement that under our law reciprocity cannot be granted.⁴

Right of asylum

In the absence of a treaty, a state may without violating any recognized international obligation decline to surrender to a demanding state a fugitive offender against the laws of the latter, but the right is that of the state to offer asylum, not that of the fugitive to insist upon it; and the arrest of United States national in Germany by United States troops for treason allegedly committed there during the Second World War was not a violation of any right of asylum conferred by international law.

"Thus it is now clear that apart from a treaty a state has no duty to deliver up a person who has sought asylum within its boundaries. If the state wishes, it can afford him a refuge and protection from the state which he has fled. Of course, a state is under no duty to afford asylum to a fugitive; it may expel him from its territories if it choose, and without complaint from the individual who is expelled. But it may grant to him an asylum, and, if such is done by it, no breach of international law is involved. The discretion, it should be noted, is that of the state to which the criminal has fled."

Criminal nature. Extradition proceedings are not in their nature criminal, even if the alleged fugitive is a criminal; extradition is not punishment for crime, even though such punishment may follow extradition.⁵

§ 25. Treaty and Statutory Provisions

Extradition treaties have the force and effect of acts of congress, binding on all courts, and should be liberally construed. Congress may provide for the surrender of criminals for extradition, with or without treaties to such effect.

In view of the rule discussed in the preceding section that international extradition in the United States is based on treaty stipulation, the United States has treaties of extradition with most governments.⁶ A treaty stipulation on the part of the government of the United States to surrender fugitives from justice is a lawful stipulation, and within the authority of the treaty making power.⁷

"Asylum," as used in extradition treaties, means a place where the matter of which a person is accused may not be tried.⁸

Effect of war. Taking into consideration the conduct of the nations involved, acting through the political branches of their governments, it has been held that a treaty of extradition was not terminated by war, but merely suspended during its existence, and is now in effect.^{8.5} However, the treaty between the United States and Germany providing for the delivery on requisition of persons charged with specified crimes, but not including treason, has been held not applicable where the treason was committed by a United States national in Germany during the Second World War.^{8.10}

Construction. The construction of an extradition treaty made by the Constitution a part of the supreme law of the land is for the courts, and they are not bound by the construction placed thereon by the executive or diplomatic branches of the government or by the foreign country with whom the treaty is made.⁹ If an extradition treaty fairly admits of two constructions, one restricting the rights which may be claimed under it and the other enlarging them, the more liberal construction is to be preferred.¹⁰ Such treaties should be construed more liberally than criminal statutes or the technical requirements of criminal procedure.¹¹ There is no room for construction, however, where the treaty is explicit on the subject.¹²

Operation and effect. In accordance with the usual rules as to the construction and operation of treaties, discussed in Treaties § 12, a treaty is of equal force with an act of congress, and the provisions of a treaty of extradition are binding on the courts.¹³ Such treaties are obligatory on the tribunals of the several states as well as those of the federal government.¹⁴ A treaty of extradition is available to persons having rights secured or recognized thereby, and may be set up as a defense to a criminal prosecution established in disregard thereof.¹⁵

It has been held that prior crimes are included within the operation of a treaty, where its language will admit of such a construction, unless they are expressly excepted.¹⁶ Accordingly, a person who has committed a crime abroad and come to the United States before the conclusion of a treaty of extradition authorizing surrender for such a crime does not thereby acquire a right of asylum,¹⁷ and a treaty construed as covering a crime committed before its conclusion¹⁸ or before the dates of the exchange of ratifications¹⁹ is not obnoxious to the objection that it is an ex post facto law.

The obligation of the government to institute extradition proceedings pursuant to a treaty with a foreign government continues until it can say that any further attempt is subversive of the protection which the government affords to all within its borders.²⁰

Statutes. The authority is vested in the federal government to enter into extradition treaties and to enact laws on the subject,²¹ and a statute of a state providing for the surrender of fugitives from the justice of foreign countries is unconstitutional and void.²² Congress has a perfect right to provide for Villareal v. Hammond, C.C.A. Tex., 74 F.2d 503.

11. Reason for rule

"The surrender of a fugitive, duly charged in the country from which he has fled with a nonpolitical offense and one generally recognized as criminal at the place of asylum, involves no impairment of any legitimate public or private interest. The obligation to do what some nations have done voluntarily, in the interests of justice and friendly international relationships . . . should be construed more liberally than a criminal statute or the technical requirements of criminal procedure." U.S.—Factor v. Laubenheimer, Ill., 54 S.Ct. 191, 197, 290 U.S. 276, 78 L. Ed. 315.

To limited extent

In the construction and carrying out of extradition treaties the ordinary technicalities of criminal proceedings are applicable only to a limited extent, since an exact correspondence between the laws of the two countries cannot be expected and the only purpose of extradition is to put the accused on trial under the laws of his own country.

"Citizens," "persons"

In view of the express provision of art 5 in the treaty with France, providing that neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens or subjects under the stipulations of the convention, a citizen of this country is not included within the term "persons" as used in art 1, providing that the contracting parties "mutually agree to deliver up persons" etc. U.S.—Valentine v. Treaty with Hellenic Republic

Stipulation in extradition treaty between Greece and United States, that state appealed to shall decide whether person claimed is its own citizen, countervails any argument that United States intended its doctrine of absolute right of expatriation to prevail in extradition demand on Greek government for return of Greek native naturalized as American citizen without Greek government's consent.

National power

Power to provide for extradition is a national power.

the surrender of criminals for extradition in its own way, with or without a treaty to that effect, and to declare that foreign criminals shall be surrendered on such proofs of criminality as it may judge sufficient;²³ and this power is not affected by the character of the criminal procedure of the foreign country or by the fact that the alleged offender is a citizen of the United States.²⁴

Whatever may be the power of congress to provide for extradition independent of treaty, that power has not been exercised save with relation to a foreign country or territory occupied or under the control of the United States,^{24.5} and aside from those provisions the act of congress relating to extradition simply defines the procedure to carry out an existing extradition treaty or convention.²⁵

Until 1848 there was no legislation in the United States on the subject of extradition. Extradition was granted under the provisions of the treaties with Great Britain and France, although the question whether a fugitive could be legally surrendered in the absence of an act of congress passed to carry out the provisions of the treaty was decided in the affirmative in many cases,²⁶ and in the negative in an early case arising under the treaty with France.²⁷

Extradition can be granted only for an offense included in the extradition treaty.

Since no authority exists in any branch of the United States government to surrender a fugitive criminal in the absence of a treaty stipulation, as discussed supra § 24, extradition can be granted, where a treaty exists, only for an offense enumerated in the treaty and this government will request extradition from a foreign government only for an offense included in the treaty.²⁸ By the enumeration in the several extradition treaties of certain crimes for which the surrender of a fugitive may be demanded, it seems that all other offenses not included in such enumeration are, by necessary implication, excluded from the operation of the treaties, and that therefore one of the contracting nations cannot, by virtue of the provisions of the treaty and as a matter of right, demand of the other nation the surrender of a person charged with an offense not specified in the treaty between the two nations.²⁹

It has been held, however, that the existence of a treaty providing for extradition for certain crimes does not deprive either contracting nation of the power and right to exercise its own discretion in cases not coming within the terms of the treaty. With relation to persons charged with offenses not named in the treaty, each government, as an incident of its sovereignty, may either grant or deny to the fugitive an asylum within its jurisdiction, and, where a person charged with a crime not provided for by treaty is delivered to the authorities of the United States as an act of comity, such person is not entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus, and none of his personal rights has been violated.³⁰ When general terms are used in an extradition treaty enumerating extraditable offenses, the courts will not confine them to their meaning at common law; the question whether a given offense comes within the treaty must be determined by the law as it exists in the two countries at the time application is made for extradition.³¹

State law governing

State law was applicable in determining whether accused was subject

The court will not decline to surrender for extradition a person charged with an extraditable offense notwithstanding a possibility that he might also be tried for the same offense within the United States.³² Whether the offense committed is an extraditable crime is a mixed question of law and of fact,³³ and the decision of the courts of the asylum country as to whether an offense is within the terms of an extradition treaty is final and the question cannot be again raised in the courts of the demanding country after extradition.³⁴ Particular crimes have been held to be, or not to be, extraditable offenses within the terms of particular treaties.³⁵

A crime subject to infamous punishment in a foreign country may be an extraditable crime under the treaty with that country, although not subject to such punishment in this country.³⁶

be considered in extradition proceedings under such a treaty, and that the application of the statute of the demanding state should be left for determination by its courts, will not be decided where it is apparent that prosecution for the offense charged is not barred by the statutes of limitations in either country.³⁷ Where there is no statute of limitations affecting the offense charged in the state in which the accused person is found, extradition proceedings are not barred by the lapse of time.³⁸

Criminality in both countries. Under some treaties an offense is extraditable only if the acts charged are criminal under the laws of both countries.³⁹ The law does not require that the name by which the crime is described in the two countries shall be the same, or that the scope of the liability shall be coextensive, or, in other respects, the same in the two countries. It is enough if the particular act charged is criminal in both jurisdictions.⁴⁰

Furthermore, in the United States, extradition for such an offense is not limited to persons charged with acts which are made criminal by the laws of the United States but may be effected as well in the case of persons charged with acts which are made criminal by the law of the foreign country and the law of the state in which the fugitive is found,⁴¹ particularly since there are no common-law crimes against the United States, although some cases speak of applying the common-law definition of a crime in extradition proceedings.⁴²

In view of the policy of our government, however, in entering into extradition treaties, to name as treaty offenses only those generally recognized as criminal by the laws in force within its own territory, where the treaty expressly names an offense as extraditable, extradition of a fugitive charged with such an offense will be granted, notwithstanding he has succeeded in finding some state, territory, or district in which the offense charged is not punishable.⁴³ This rule is subject to the qualification that where the treaty naming the offense as extraditable also expressly provides that it must be made criminal by the laws of both countries, as, for example, paragraph 4 of article 1 of the Convention of 1889 with Great Britain, the offense charged must also be a crime within the state where the fugitive is found.⁴⁴

Where an extradition treaty uses general names, such as "murder" or "arson," in defining the classes of crimes for which extradition may be granted thereunder, such names are not necessarily confined to their meaning at common law, but the question whether a given offense comes within the treaty must be determined by the law as it exists in the two countries at the time the extradition is applied for.⁴⁵ The fact that the crime committed did not also constitute a crime in the asylum country at the time it was committed is immaterial, if it constituted a crime in both countries at the time demand was made.⁴⁶

Escape after conviction. Where the prisoner has been convicted in a foreign country of an extraditable offense and has fled his country to escape punishment, he is a fugitive from justice and may be extradited.⁴⁷

"War crimes"

Indictment alleging that many un-question whether or not an offense is political is by express provision of several of the treaties of the United States declared to rest with the authorities of the government on which the demand for surrender is made, but in the absence of such a conventional provision the right to determine the question undoubtedly inheres in the government of which the extradition is requested.⁴⁹ What constitutes a political offense has not been satisfactorily defined,^{49,5} and depends on the particular circumstances of each case.⁵⁰ To bring an offense within the meaning of the words "of a political character" it must be incidental to, and form part of, political disturbances.⁵¹ An extradition magistrate has jurisdiction, and it is his duty, to determine whether an offense charged is political within the meaning of the treaty provision.⁵²

§ 27. — Joinder of Offenses

The joinder of a nonextraditable offense with an extraditable offense in a complaint is not fatal.

If two offenses, only one of which is specified as extraditable in the treaty, are joined in the complaint, this will not render the warrant unlawful as it will not be presumed that the demanding government, contrary to the provisions of the treaty, will punish for an offense not specified in the treaty.⁵³

§ 28. Persons Who May Be Extradited

In the absence of a treaty restriction to the contrary, a citizen of the country on which the demand is made may be extradited.

In the absence of any treaty stipulation providing otherwise, it is immaterial that the person whose extradition is demanded is a citizen of the country on which the demand is made.⁵⁴ Many of the extradition treaties of the United States, however, contain a provision declaring that neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to surrender its own citizens, and where a treaty so provides there can be no such surrender or demand.⁵⁵

Some treaties contain a provision that neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens or subjects under the stipulations of the convention, but they shall have the power to deliver them up if in their discretion it is deemed proper to do so.⁵⁶ When a treaty does not exempt from extradition citizens who have returned to their native country after committing a crime in the demanding country, the United States will extradite its own citizens who are seeking asylum in the United States, even though the foreign government demanding their extradition makes a different interpretation of the treaty and refuses to extradite its own citizens under similar conditions.⁵⁷

"Fugitives." Where the treaty provides for the delivery up of those who "shall seek an asylum" and those who "shall be found" in the respective jurisdictions, the right of extradition is not limited to fugitives, but applies to those who shall be found in the jurisdiction who have committed extraditable offenses, irrespective of whether or not they are fugitives.⁵⁸ A treaty, however, containing a mutual undertaking of the parties to deliver up on requisition any person who may be charged with, or may identified persons were killed on orders of one, who was sought to be extradited to Yugoslavia, while he was a Government official in Croatia during World War II, charged offenses of a political character within meaning of Treaty between the United States and Yugoslavia prohibiting surrender of fugitives charged with political offenses; and the fact that alleged offenses were allegedly "war crimes" would not cause them to lose their character as "political offenses."

Political uprising

"Political character" means an offense against the government itself or incident to political uprisings. It is not a political offense because the crime was committed by a politician. The crime must be incidental to, and form a part of, political disturbances. It must be in furtherance of one side or another of a bona fide struggle for political power.

have been convicted of, any of the crimes specified, committed within the territorial jurisdiction of one of the parties, and who shall be found within the territories of the other, applies only to fugitives who have fled the country where the crime was committed.^{58.5}

§ 29. "Jurisdiction" and "Territory"

The words "jurisdiction" and "territory," as used in treaties providing for the surrender of persons charged with crimes committed within the jurisdiction of one of the parties, who may be found within the territory of the other, have generally been construed to mean "territorial jurisdiction."

Treaties of extradition provide for the surrender of persons charged with crimes committed within the "jurisdiction" of one of the contracting parties, who may be found within the "territory" of the other. These words have generally been construed to mean "territorial jurisdiction,"⁵⁹ although there is a judicial decision giving to "jurisdiction" an enlarged meaning equivalent to "power of the courts" and permitting the extradition from the United States to Germany of a German subject who had committed an offense in Belgium.⁶⁰ The attorney general decided in this case, however, that the words "committed within the jurisdiction," as used in the treaty, do not refer to the personal liabilities of the criminal, but to locality; and that the place where the crime is committed must be within the jurisdiction of the party demanding the fugitive, in other words, within the territorial jurisdiction.⁶¹

the country demanding his extradition at the time of the commission of the alleged offense is necessary would seem to depend on the nature of the offense charged,⁶² and also on the language of the particular treaty describing the person to be surrendered as a fugitive or otherwise.⁶³ A treaty providing for the extradition of persons charged with offenses "committed within the jurisdiction of" either party does not authorize the extradition of a person charged with the commission of an offense in a place or country which was not at the time within the jurisdiction of the country seeking the extradition, although it has since been brought within such jurisdiction.⁶⁴

For a historical discussion of the operation of extraterritoriality on extradition see 25 C.J. p 330 note 21-p 331 note 40.

§ 30. — Vessels

62. False pretenses

(1) The crime of obtaining money under false pretenses is committed where the victim parts with his money as a result of the false pretenses. Thus the drawer of a draft in this country on a Canadian bank was subject to extradition to Canada, where its collection by the bank in Canada was as his agent, and the collection constituted the offense.

Extradition held not necessary

Extradition was not necessary merely because master of United States merchant vessel put wounded crew member ashore in Spanish Morocco after he allegedly committed assault and manslaughter on board vessel and, in absence of United States consul, sought assistance of British consul in restraining him, since he was never in the custody of British consul as such and had not sought asylum in any country.

66. U.S.—In re Newman, C.C.Cal., 79 F. 622.

§ 31. Authority to Entertain, Institute, or Conduct Proceedings

Extradition of a person to or from the United States should be conducted by the federal government.

Extradition of a fugitive from a foreign country, in which he has taken refuge, to the United States must be conducted by the federal government.⁶⁷ The fact that the demand was made by the governor of the state on the foreign government is not, however, a defense for the accused after he is brought to this country.⁶⁸

The governor of a state does not have the power to deliver up to a foreign government a person charged with having committed a crime in the territory of that government.⁶⁹ Extradition proceedings to secure the removal from the United States of one charged with crime must be prosecuted by the foreign government in the public interest, and may not be used by a private party for private vengeance or personal purposes.⁷⁰

Authority to make complaint in extradition proceedings is discussed infra § 37.

§ 32. Indictment or Warrant of Arrest in Foreign Country

The secretary of state cannot order the extradition of a prisoner until such time as he has been charged, in the courts of the demanding country, with an extraditable offense.

Although the commissioner may take into custody an alleged fugitive before the filing of a charge against him in the courts of the demanding country,⁷¹ under the statute defining the powers of the secretary of state he cannot order the extradition of a prisoner until such time as he has been charged, in the courts of the demanding country, with an extraditable offense.⁷² In the absence of a treaty requirement to the contrary, however, it is not necessary that there have been some authorized public accusation of equivalent effect of an indictment, since to adopt such a rule would interpolate in the treaties a condition requiring what might, in some countries, be considered objectionable as a partial prejudication of guilt in cases to be afterward tried.⁷³

A treaty requiring that the fugitive shall have been "accused" of the crimes enumerated means merely that he is to be charged or accused in due form of law.⁷⁴ Where the treaty requires as a prerequisite to a requisition for the surrender of a fugitive criminal that a warrant of arrest shall have issued in the foreign country, the judicial department will presume, from the mandate of the secretary of state, that such a warrant was issued,⁷⁵ and the issuance of such a warrant in the foreign country may also be proved by depositions, properly authenticated.⁷⁶

It has furthermore been held that congress has dispensed with the requirement with respect to the production of a copy of a warrant of arrest, or

Extradition treaties usually provide for the presentation to the executive of the asylum country of a requisition for the surrender of the accused person.

Extradition treaties usually provide for the presentation, to the executive of the government of which the surrender of a fugitive criminal is sought, of a requisition therefor, by the chief diplomatic or consular officer of the demanding government.⁷⁸ Requisitions for surrender of fugitives are addressed to the executive, not the judicial, branch of the government.⁷⁹

Technical objections as to matters of form will not be favorably considered and it is sufficient if the certificates, signatures, etc., are in substantial conformity with the requirements of the statutes and give reasonable assurance of authenticity.⁸⁰ The failure to produce a requisition before the extradition commissioner may be cured by producing in a habeas corpus proceeding a certified copy of the requisition on file in the office of the secretary of state.⁸¹

Where, however, it is clear that the individual concerning whom extradition is sought by a foreign country does not come within the treaty provisions relating to extradition between such country and the United States, the department of state may deny extradition without submitting the matter to any court or commissioner.^{81.5}

Necessity for presentation of formal requisition to committing magistrate in proceedings for provisional arrest is considered infra § 38.

§ 34. Proceedings before Committing or Examining Magistrate

Jurisdiction of preliminary proceedings for extradition to a foreign country is, in the United States, vested by statute solely in judges or justices of the United States, commissioners expressly authorized by federal courts, and judges of state courts of record of general jurisdiction. The proceedings are before the judge, justice, or commissioner as a magistrate of the United States and not as a court.

Except where the foreign country or territory to which extradition is sought is under the control of the United States, in which case the proceedings must be before a judge of a court of the United States,⁸² under the statute, 18 U.S.C.A. § 3184, jurisdiction of proceedings, preliminary to final executive action, for extradition to a foreign country is vested in any judge or justice of the United States, who may be a justice of the United States supreme court⁸³ or a United States district judge,⁸⁴ or in a commissioner⁸⁵ expressly authorized to act by any of the courts of the United States,⁸⁶ or in a judge of a court of record of general jurisdiction of any state.⁸⁷

A commissioner empowered to act in an extradition case is deemed a magistrate,⁸⁸ and likewise a state or federal judge is, when hearing an extradition proceeding, a magistrate of the United States,⁸⁹ the proceeding not being a suit, prosecution, or proceeding in the court of which he is judge.⁹⁰

The jurisdiction of the commissioner or other magistrate involves both jurisdiction of the subject matter, that is, authority to act in extradition cases, and jurisdiction of the alleged fugitive.⁹¹

§ 35. — Preliminary Requisition

No requisition from the demanding government is necessary in so far as the preliminary proceedings before a United States commissioner or other committing magistrate are concerned.

No preliminary requisition is required from the demanding government to initiate extradition proceedings before, and confer jurisdiction on, a United States commissioner or other committing magistrate.⁹²

Requisitions generally are discussed supra § 33.

§ 36. — Preliminary Mandate

Where not required by treaty, either because the treaty makes no provision therefor or makes only a permissive, and not obligatory, provision, the prior issuance of an executive mandate by the secretary of state is not an essential prerequisite to the entertaining of extradition proceedings by a magistrate.

In the United States it is established by judicial decisions and executive practice that, in cases where the treaty does not require a previous executive mandate, the issuing of such a mandate is not essential as a prerequisite to the entertaining of proceedings and the issuing of a warrant of arrest by a magistrate.⁹³ Prior to 1852⁹⁴ it was the practice of extradition magistrates generally to entertain complaints in cases of extradition without the prior presentation of a mandate. The majority of the court in the case of Kaine did not agree as to the interpretation to be given to the treaty and law, and the case came before Mr. Justice Nelson at chambers, who held that the previous authority of the executive should have been obtained to warrant the interposition of the judiciary.⁹⁵ The same view was also expressed in a few other cases.⁹⁶ The secretary of state does not now issue mandates except where provision is made therefor by treaty, and even when a treaty contains such a provision it has been held that the language of the treaty is permissive and not necessarily obligatory.⁹⁷

The mandate when issued is granted under the hand of the secretary of state and the seal of the department of state,⁹⁸ the secretary of state acting for the president;⁹⁹ it is issued at the instance of the foreign power acting through its diplomatic or consular agents as designated in the treaties;¹ and it imports that the preliminary steps to justify its issuance have been taken.² There is no special form prescribed by law. It is sufficient if the offense is described in the terms of the treaty.³ A mandate issued by the executive remains operative until recalled by the executive or until he signifies in some way that its functions are exhausted.⁴

§ 37. — Complaint

- a. Authority to make
- b. Allegations
- c. Verification

a. Authority to Make

The requisite complaint may and must be made by someone acting under the authority of the foreign government seeking the extradition.

Treaty provisions concerning what officers may make requisitions have no bearing on who may initiate judicial proceedings.⁵ The complaint under oath which, under the statute, 18 U.S.C.A. § 3184, is necessary to the institution of proceedings for extradition to a foreign country may and must be made by someone acting under the authority or sanction of the executive of the foreign government.⁶

A complaint of this character may be made by the consul of the foreign government⁷ and ordinarily is made through him or directly on papers sworn to by the foreign officers representing the executive;⁸ but it is not necessary that the complaint should be made by the consul, or by officers of the executive department, of the foreign government. Any person authorized by the executive department to act is a proper person to appear and file a complaint.⁹

Where a complaint is made by a consul, his official character is sufficient evidence of his authority;¹⁰ and although, where the complaint is made by a private individual, it must appear that he is acting under the authority of the foreign government,¹¹ it is sufficient if this showing is made at any time while the proceedings are pending before the commissioner.¹² If it appears by the complaint that the moving party is the authorized agent of the demanding government, he need not swear to this fact in the jurat,¹³ nor need an officer representing a foreign government swear to his official character in the complaint if it sufficiently appears in the testimony that he is a properly authorized agent of the demanding power.¹⁴

The complaint should set forth the knowledge of complainant on which he makes the complaint, the substance of the offense charged, and, where the proceeding is before a commissioner, the special authority of such commissioner to act in the proceeding; but it need not allege the issuance of a mandate by the executive of this country, nor need it allege the issuance of a warrant abroad where the pertinent treaty does not make such issuance a condition precedent to the preliminary parts of the extradition proceeding.

A complaint in a proceeding for extradition to a foreign country may be held sufficient¹⁵ without regard to refinements of pleading.¹⁶ While it is not necessary to charge the offense with the particularity of an indictment, it should be sufficiently explicit to inform accused of the nature of the charge.^{16.5}

The question of whether there is a variance between the complaint and the evidence is to be decided by the general law, and not by that of the state.¹⁷

Authority of commissioner. If the proceedings are before a commissioner, the complaint should show the authority of the commissioner to act in the proceedings, by describing the commissioner as a commissioner specially authorized to act in extradition proceedings,¹⁸ although there is a dictum to the contrary.¹⁹ An extradition commissioner is not authorized, after the conclusion of the proceedings before him, to amend the complaint by interlining the word "extradition" before the word "commissioner" in the description of the magistrate.²⁰

Knowledge. The complaint should sufficiently set forth the knowledge of complainant on which he makes the complaint, although it need not be made on his personal knowledge.²¹ A complaint made on telegraphic information²² and a complaint on telegrams and depositions from the authorities of the government demanding the extradition, made by a consular officer of a foreign country,²³ have been held sufficient; but a contrary view has also been asserted.²⁴

Warrant or other proceedings in demanding country. Where it is not a necessary preliminary to an investigation, under an extradition treaty, that a warrant shall have been issued abroad, it is not essential that the complaint allege such issuance.²⁵ A complaint on oath by a duly authorized officer that accused had been charged before a justice of the peace in the foreign country with murder there committed, and a warrant issued for arrest, the original warrant being attached to the complaint, and that the officer believes the charge as stated in the warrant to be true, is sufficient to give the commissioner jurisdiction to issue a warrant of arrest.²⁶

The record of the proceedings before the foreign court and the deposition of witnesses therein contained on which the extradition proceedings are based need not be attached to the complaint if they are in the custody and keeping of the one making the complaint and the commissioner is possessed of the information which they contain,²⁷ and although it is advisable in extradition proceedings that certified copies of the foreign complaint and warrant be attached to, and made a part of, the local complaint, it is sufficient if they be presented to the commissioner at the hearing.²⁸

Issuance or description of mandate. It is not necessary that the complaint should state that a mandate has been issued by the executive,²⁹ it being sufficient if the mandate is exhibited to the committing magistrate between the time of the arrest of accused under a warrant issued on the complaint and the final hearing.³⁰ A variance between the mandate and the complaint, the former referring to accused as "George Macdonell," and the latter as "George Macdonell, otherwise Macdonnell," has been held not to be fatal.³¹

Statement of offense. The complaint should set forth clearly, but briefly, the substance of the offense charged, so that the court can see that one or more of the particular crimes enumerated in the treaty is alleged to have been committed.³² While the complaint must be sufficiently clear and distinct in its averments to enable the party accused to understand precisely what he is charged with,³³ it need not set forth the crime with the particularity of an indictment, but need only conform to the requirements for a preliminary complaint according to the local law where accused is found.³⁴

It need not expressly allege that the offense was committed in the demanding country if such fact can be inferred from other allegations of the complaint.³⁵ If the complaint describes an offense punishable by the laws of both countries and included under some name in the extradition treaty, it is sufficient;³⁶ and even if a complaint charges two offenses only one of which is extraditable, the detention of accused under an extradition warrant will be upheld, since it will not be presumed that the demanding government will try him for an offense other than that for which he is surrendered.³⁷ A complaint charging an offense at common law is sufficient, notwithstanding it concludes "against the form of the statute."³⁸

Under a treaty providing that offenses which are committed thereafter are alone embraced, the date of the offense must be shown in the complaint.³⁹

Where a treaty provides for the surrender of persons charged with the crimes therein specified, "when these crimes are subject to infamous punishment," it is regarded as doubtful whether it is necessary to aver in the complaint that the offense for which the extradition is sought is subject to infamous punishment.⁴⁰

c. Verification

The complaint must be made under oath; but it may be made on information and belief, provided the sources of the information and the grounds of the belief are stated; and the oath need not be taken before the judge or commissioner who issues the warrant of arrest.

complaint must be made "under oath."⁴¹ It is not necessary that the oath to the complaint be taken before a commissioner authorized to act in extradition proceedings,⁴² or before the judge or commissioner who issues the warrant of arrest,⁴³ or even before a magistrate in the country to which the fugitive has fled, provided that after it has been made in the country where the crime was committed the affidavit or a duly certified copy of the affidavit is transmitted to the government of the country to which the fugitive has fled.⁴⁴

A complaint which makes charges solely on information and belief without attempt to set forth the sources of the information or grounds of the belief is bad,⁴⁵ and it is not cured by the fact that complainant described himself as a government detective duly authorized as the agent of the demanding government to prosecute extradition proceedings.⁴⁶

However, if the representative of the foreign government has no personal knowledge of the facts, he may make the complaint on information and belief, stating the sources of his information and the grounds for his belief,⁴⁷ and annexing to the complaint a properly certified copy of an indictment or equivalent proceedings which may have been found in the foreign country,⁴⁸ or a copy of the deposition of witnesses, having actual knowledge of the facts, taken under the treaty and act of congress,⁴⁹ or supporting it by the testimony of witnesses who were stated to have deposed and are therefore presumed to have been sworn.⁵⁰

The irregularity, if any, in making a complaint in extradition proceedings on information and belief without attaching thereto the record of the foreign court which is the basis of the proceeding is cured by the production at the hearing of such record, which is sufficient to justify the detention of accused.⁵¹

§ 38. — Provisional Arrest and Detention; Warrant

To be valid under the statute authorizing a magistrate to issue a warrant for the arrest of a fugitive from a foreign country, the warrant must be preceded by a sufficient complaint under oath; it must, if issued by a commissioner, show on its face that the commissioner is authorized to act in extradition cases; and it must recite the fact, if it is a fact, that a mandate has been issued by the executive. Under treaty, a fugitive may be provisionally arrested and detained pending the production of extradition papers.

The magistrate possesses statutory authority, on compliance with the prescribed conditions, to issue his warrant for the apprehension of the person charged, that he may be brought before such magistrate, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered.⁵² A warrant issued without a sufficient complaint on oath is invalid.⁵³ Also a warrant which does not show on its face that the commissioner issuing it is a commissioner authorized to act in extradition cases is void,⁵⁴ unless the treaty obviates the necessity of such showing.⁵⁵

Where a mandate has been issued by the executive, the warrant of arrest must recite that fact.⁵⁶ The warrant need not state with particularity the offense with which defendant is charged; it is sufficient if it follow the terms of the statute or treaty.⁵⁷

A commissioner authorized by a court of the United States to act in extradition cases has power to issue a warrant on which a marshal of a district in another state may arrest a fugitive;⁵⁸ but it becomes the duty of the marshal to take accused before the nearest magistrate in his district who is authorized by the treaty and the acts of congress to hear and consider the evidence of criminality.⁵⁹

The provisional arrest and detention of a criminal fugitive, in advance of the presentation of a formal requisition with proofs, is within the letter and spirit of most, if not all, of the extradition treaties of the United States with other nations.⁶⁰ Such arrest and detention may be made on telegraphic request, provided the request is made by such person or persons that officials in this country representing both of the high contracting parties are justified in believing the truth of the statements contained in the telegram.⁶¹ Under some treaties a prisoner cannot be detained longer than forty days unless extradition documents have been produced.⁶²

§ 39. — Hearing and Evidence

- a. In general
- b. Matters to be proved, considered, and determined
- c. Admissibility of evidence generally
- d. Examination of witnesses by, and admission of evidence for, accused
- e. Admissibility of documentary evidence
- f. Weight and sufficiency of evidence

a. In General

A hearing is necessary; and the procedure in conducting it is governed by the laws of the state wherein it is held; but form is not to be insisted on beyond the requirements of safety and justice. The magistrate may, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, grant, or refuse to grant, an adjournment of the hearing.

A person arrested on an extradition warrant is entitled to a hearing⁶³ within the state, district, or territory where he is found,⁶⁴ to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered.^{64.5} It is provided by statute, 18 U.S.C.A. § 3189,

that the hearing shall be held on land, publicly, and in a room or office easily accessible to the public. The examination must be conducted according to the laws of the state in which the proceeding is had, in the particulars in which such proceedings are not specially regulated by a statute of the United States.⁶⁵

The old doctrine that proceedings for the extradition of an alien are to be conducted with extreme technicality has been abandoned. The proceedings before the commissioner are not to be treated as if they were a trial before a petit jury;⁶⁶ and form is not to be insisted on beyond the requirements of safety and justice.⁶⁷

Adjournment. The magistrate may in the exercise of a just and reasonable discretion grant adjournments.⁶⁸ His action in adjourning a hearing will not be held unreasonable unless it is shown that he has abused his discretion,⁶⁹ nor will the continuation of proceedings before an extradition commissioner for a longer period than an examining magistrate is authorized to continue a case under the state laws invalidate proceedings for extradition under a treaty providing that extradition shall be carried out "in conformity with the laws regulating extradition for the time being in force in the surrendering States," as the laws contemplated therein are those of the United States, and not the laws of the particular state within which the proceedings are taken.⁷⁰

An adjournment to enable the prisoner to obtain evidence from abroad lies within the discretion of the commissioner whose action in refusing to grant it will not be reviewed,⁷¹ especially if the affidavits in support of the motion do not show that there is any evidence on the part of the prisoner that exists or is accessible or is likely to be obtained.⁷² Although the magistrate is supposed to give the prosecution every reasonable opportunity to secure its evidence, it is not contemplated that a subject and resident of the asylum state shall be held in custody or under bail indefinitely.⁷³

b. Matters to Be Proved, Considered, and Determined

The hearing before an extradition magistrate is of limited scope, it being in the nature of a preliminary hearing or examination having reference only to a commitment for future trial. Various matters are not to be considered or determined therein, and consequently evidence thereof need not be introduced. The magistrate is required, by statute, if he deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty, to certify the same, together with a copy of all testimony taken before him, to the secretary of state.

The hearing before a commissioner or other magistrate in a proceeding for extradition to a foreign country is not a full trial, but is in the nature of a preliminary hearing or examination having reference only to a commitment for future trial.⁷⁴ It covers at least two points, namely, a determination of the place of the commission of the alleged offense and a determination of whether the alleged offense is covered by the terms of the treaty.⁷⁵

However, where the magistrate has jurisdiction, and the crime charged is an extraditable one, the sole question before him for determination is whether there is competent legal evidence which, according to the laws of the state where accused is found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been committed in that state,⁷⁶ or, in other words, whether the evidence shows a probable cause of belief in the fugitive's guilt of the offense charged.⁷⁷

of defense at the trial to be had subsequently in the foreign country,⁷⁸ and he has nothing to do with the question whether the government of the foreign country has duly authorized an application for the extradition.⁷⁹ Likewise, it is not his province or function to inquire or determine whether accused is guilty⁸⁰ or whether, if surrendered, he will be given a fair and impartial trial in the demanding country.⁸¹

The sufficiency of the complaint or other charge or accusation in the foreign country is not an issue in the proceeding before the extradition magistrate⁸² and is not before him for consideration except as it may tend to show whether or not accused has committed an extraditable crime.⁸³ Indeed, it is not necessary to produce an indictment found in the foreign country⁸⁴ or to introduce evidence of the institution of proceedings against accused in such country.⁸⁵ Also forged papers produced to, and deposed to by, witnesses giving depositions abroad, where the charge is forgery, need not be produced here before the commissioner.⁸⁶

Cure of failure to produce requisition, or certified copy thereof, before the commissioner is considered supra § 33.

Where the magistrate deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty or convention, he may and must, as provided by statute, "certify the same, together with a copy of all the testimony taken before him, to the Secretary of State."⁸⁷ To comply with this statute the commissioner should keep a record of all the oral evidence taken before him, together

In proceeding for extradition of alleged criminal to Yugoslavia, text of indictment filed against him in such country controls over text of extradition complaint, to which copy of indictment is attached, if there is any difference between them, and whole indictment must be read to determine whether conduct complained of was of political character within provision of treaty with Yugoslavia prohibiting surrender of fugitive charged with political offense.

Presumptions. In international extradition proceedings, general rules as to presumptions apply.^{89.5}

c. Admissibility of Evidence Generally

The evidence receivable in an international extradition proceeding is not limited by the technical rules governing the admissibility of evidence in criminal prosecutions generally.

It is not essential that the evidence in a proceeding before a magistrate for extradition to a foreign country comply with the technical rules governing the admissibility of evidence in a criminal trial⁹⁰ or that it be receivable in a local prosecution⁹¹ or on a local preliminary examination,⁹² as the phrase "such evidence of criminality," in treaties providing for extradition only on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where accused is found, would justify his commitment for trial, refers only to the sufficiency of the evidence to block out the elements essential to a conviction and not to the rules governing the admissibility of the evidence.⁹³

It has been said that greater liberality in the reception of evidence is exercised than is done in other civil proceedings,^{93.5} and even hearsay evidence may be received in a proceeding of this kind,⁹⁴ although, as noted infra subdivision f of this section, the hearsay character of a statement is a factor to be considered in determining the weight to be accorded it. Also the fact that alleged dying declarations fall short of being such does not make them inadmissible as evidence in an extradition proceeding.⁹⁵

The testimony of an accomplice is admissible, as is also evidence in corroboration thereof;⁹⁶ and, where obtaining money by false pretenses is charged, testimony of the defrauded person that he relied on accused's representation is admissible evidence of a fact best known to himself.⁹⁷

The accused has a limited right to introduce oral evidence in his behalf by testifying himself and examining other witnesses; but he should not be permitted to introduce evidence which would require the demanding country to conduct the trial at the place of arrest, instead of at the place where the offense was committed.

Accused has a right to be examined as a witness in his own behalf on an investigation before a commissioner.⁹⁸ He is also entitled to examine witnesses in his own behalf;⁹⁹ but his right to examine witnesses or introduce evidence in his own behalf is not unlimited¹ under statutes, treaties, or consti-

There is no warrant in the law or practice for receiving in behalf of Federal statutes

(1) The provision of the federal statute providing a means whereby accused may secure the attendance of witnesses does not give him the right to introduce all evidence which would be admissible on a trial under an issue of not guilty.

Treaties and state laws

(1) The law of the state cannot give to a prisoner held for extradition a right to introduce evidence which would be incompetent under the extradition treaty. e. Admissibility of Documentary Evidence

Papers, or copies thereof, are, under a statute, admissible in evidence for all the purposes of the hearing where they are properly and legally authenticated so as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused has escaped. Proof that the papers, or copies thereof, offered in evidence are authenticated in the required manner may be made in the mode provided by statute, namely, by the certificate of the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States resident in the foreign country; but the statutory mode of proof is not exclusive.

By virtue of statute, 18 U.S.C.A. § 3190, any depositions, warrants, or other papers, or copies thereof are admissible in evidence on the hearing of an extradition case,⁸ for all the purposes of the hearing,⁹ if, as shown infra this section, they are properly and legally authenticated.

Time of filing

Under article of Treaty of Kingdom of Serbia providing that provisional detention of a fugitive shall cease and prisoner shall be released if a formal requisition for his surrender accompanied by necessary evidence of criminality has not been produced under stipulations of treaty within two months from date of his provisional arrest and detention, accused, who was released on bail in habeas corpus action on Sept. 20, 1951, following arrest on Aug. 29, 1951, was not entitled to have stricken exhibits filed ten days before date set for hearing on an amended complaint in June of 1958.

U.S.—U. S. ex rel. Karadzole v. Artukovic, D.C.Cal., 170 F.Supp. 383.

Identity and criminality of accused

(1) In proceedings to extradite one charged with bank robbery, admission in evidence of duly authenticated depositions and photograph of one of bank robbers, authenticated by two witnesses, and attached to depositions, which appeared to be likeness of accused, was proper method of proving identity.

U.S.—Bagley v. Starwich, C.C.A. Wash., 8 F.2d 42.

(2) Copies of depositions from abroad, taken subsequently to the date of the original warrant of arrest issued abroad, may be admissible in evidence as constituting, with oral evidence taken before the commissioner, legal testimony tending to prove the criminality of accused, and material for a decision of the commissioner on the question of fact, as to the criminality of accused.

The class of properly authenticated papers admissible under the statute includes ex parte affidavits,¹⁰ unsworn statements,¹¹ depositions¹² even though unsworn to,¹³ a translation of a deposition testified to by the translator as correct,¹⁴ and papers purporting to be depositions, and so certified, although the recitals contained in the introductory part thereof show that they are mere statements and not depositions.¹⁵

It is not limited to papers on which a warrant of arrest was issued abroad;¹⁶ and a prior statutory provision dealing only with the admission in evidence of copies of foreign depositions is deemed, by virtue of its inconsistency with the present statute, to fall within a repealing clause of the latter statute.¹⁷

In the case of extradition to the United States the documentary evidence required by the state department has been prescribed by departmental regulation.¹⁸

The authentication contemplated by the statute is a proper and legal authentication entitling the papers in question to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country from which accused has escaped.¹⁹ By virtue of express statutory provision, the certificate of the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States, resident in the foreign country, is proof that the papers offered in evidence are authenticated in the required manner.²⁰

It is said that under the present statute the single test of admissibility of documentary evidence is the consular certificate,²¹ and, while it is true that a former statutory provision requiring copies of depositions to be attested on oath of the party producing them to be true copies of the original depositions is eliminated,²² a consular certificate is the only mode of proof of authentication now provided for by statute,²³ and it is not necessary, otherwise than by the certificate of the consul, to prove that the law of the foreign country would allow copies of depositions taken before a magistrate to be received as proof of criminality.²⁴ Nevertheless, the statutory mode of proving authentication is not exclusive²⁵ and resort may be had to other proof.²⁶

Where dependence is placed on a certificate or certificates, each piece of documentary evidence, whether an original²⁷ or a copy,²⁸ offered in support of the charge against accused should be accompanied by a certificate,²⁹ unless the court can ascertain with reasonable certainty what papers are referred to in the certificate.³⁰

To justify a magistrate in committing a prisoner for extradition to a foreign country, it is not necessary that the evidence be sufficient to convict; all that is required is that the evidence be such as would be deemed sufficient to justify holding the prisoner for trial if the offense had been committed in the state where accused is found; and this requirement is satisfied by evidence affording reasonable ground to believe that accused is guilty of the offense which is charged and is within the treaty.

The laws of the place where the criminal is found furnish the rule as to what evidence is necessary to authorize his arrest and commitment;³¹ and in the United States the law of the place where found is the law of the asylum state.³²

Under the federal statute which directs a certification of the evidence to the secretary of state, as considered, supra, subdivision b of this section, and the issuance of a warrant for the commitment of accused to jail to await surrender to the foreign government, infra § 40, if the magistrate deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty or convention, see 18 U.S.C.A. § 3184, and under a treaty provision, which appears in most of the extradition treaties of the United States, that extradition shall be granted only on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime or offense had been there committed,³³ it is sufficient to warrant commitment for extradition, especially where the legality of the detention is questioned subsequently in habeas corpus proceedings, discussed in Habeas Corpus § 39, that there is legal evidence on which the magistrate may properly conclude that accused has committed an offense within the treaty as charged,³⁴ and his conclusion to this effect may be based on such evidence as would be deemed sufficient to justify holding accused for trial if the offense had been committed in this country.³⁵

Although in some of the earlier cases it was held that, in cases under a treaty of extradition, the proof that the offense has been committed by the fugitive in the foreign jurisdiction should be sufficient to warrant a conviction,³⁶ or at least an in-

Commitment for trial

It is not the function of the committing magistrate to determine whether accused is guilty, but merely whether there was competent evidence, which according to the law of the state, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime had been committed in that state.

dictment,³⁷ it is now established that, in an extradition case, it is not necessary that the evidence be sufficient to convict³⁸ or to convince the magistrate of accused's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt,³⁹ it being sufficient that the evidence affords reasonable ground or probable cause to believe that accused is guilty of the offense charged and that it is within the treaty.⁴⁰

The magistrate may determine the credibility of witnesses⁴¹ and the weight to be given testimony presented by depositions, he not being required, either by treaty or by statute, to accept blindly, and without question, testimony produced by deposition.⁴² The hearsay character of a statement is a factor to be considered in determining the weight to be accorded it;⁴³ and evidence which is entirely hearsay is insufficient;⁴⁴ but circumstantial evidence has been held sufficient to justify committing the fugitive.⁴⁵ The conviction of a fugitive in contumaciam in his absence is to be treated merely as a charge of crime and not as a conviction.⁴⁶

Situs of crime. Extradition from the United States is precluded by evidence establishing that the act alleged to be criminal was done in this country;⁴⁷ and even where the evidence warrants the commissioner or other magistrate in believing, as it sometimes does,⁴⁸ that the crime under consideration took place in a foreign country, a preliminary finding to this effect is not conclusive of the fundamental issue, the question of the situs of the crime being merely preliminary to a determination of actual guilt.⁴⁹

The identity of the prisoner must be established by legal proof in each case;⁵⁰ but it may be sufficiently established by his admissions⁵¹ and the testimony of other persons,⁵² or by comparison of his features with a photograph of accused identified by, and attached to, the depositions taken in the foreign country.⁵³ The fact that the fugitive's name is spelled differently in the languages of the demanding and the asylum countries is immaterial, since a fugitive may be held under an alias without knowledge of his true name.⁵⁴

§ 40. — Commitment for Extradition

It is the statutory duty of the magistrate, when he deems the evidence sufficient to support the charge, to issue his warrant for the commitment of the prisoner to the proper jail to await surrender to the foreign government. His order or warrant of commitment need not specifically set forth the charge established by the evidence.

er treaty or convention, to issue his warrant for the commitment of the person charged to the proper jail, there to remain until surrender to the foreign government shall be made, may and should be complied with.⁵⁵ A magistrate's order of commitment must be interpreted as limited by his finding as to the charge established by the evidence,⁵⁶ and it need not specifically set forth that charge.⁵⁷

A second warrant may be issued for the arrest of an alleged fugitive after his discharge, or even during the pendency of habeas corpus proceedings, although it cannot be executed while accused is in the custody of the court in such proceedings.

Where an alleged fugitive has been discharged, a new complaint may be made, and a new warrant issued for his arrest, with a view to a reexamination of the case.⁵⁸ Where the fugitive has been discharged on the ground of insufficiency of evidence, the sufficiency of the additional evidence need not be considered prior to the issue of a second warrant.⁵⁹ In such a case a second warrant may issue on the same papers,⁶⁰ and the same is true when the first warrant is of questionable regularity.⁶¹

Where an extradition commissioner has committed the accused for extradition, and the commitment has been set aside on habeas corpus for errors on the examination, accused is not necessarily released, but may be held under the warrant of arrest with a view to a new examination before the commissioner.⁶² While a second warrant can be validly issued,⁶³ it cannot be executed,⁶⁴ while habeas corpus proceedings are pending and the prisoner is in the custody of the court in such proceedings.

§ 42. — Bail

Bail may be granted in an international extradition case, but there is no right thereto, and usually it is not granted.

A prisoner is not entitled as of right to bail pending examination in an international extradition case;⁶⁵ and, while power to grant bail exists,⁶⁶ it should be exercised very sparingly⁶⁷ and only when the justification is pressing, as well as plain,⁶⁸ or there are unusual circumstances.⁶⁹

That it is ever advisable to admit to bail prior to the date of a reasonably early examination is denied;⁷⁰ but, on the other hand, the court may feel constrained to admit the prisoner to bail where considerable time must necessarily elapse before a hearing is held and the offense charged is bailable under the laws both of the state and the demanding country.⁷¹

The practice is not to admit to bail⁷² or not to do so usually.⁷³ A refusal to admit a fugitive to bail, even though based on the ground of want of power, is not reversible error.⁷⁴

§ 43. — Review

No appeal lies from the decision of a magistrate in an international extradition proceeding.

The decision of the magistrate in an international extradition proceeding is not appealable;⁷⁵ but, as shown infra § 44, it may be revised by the executive.

The scope of the inquiry in habeas corpus proceedings is stated in Habeas Corpus § 39. The writ of certiorari accompanying a writ of habeas corpus does not confer on the court any wider range of determination on the sufficiency of the facts shown than does the writ of habeas corpus.⁷⁶

§ 44. Surrender to Demanding Country

Provisions relative to the delivery of a person committed for extradition to an authorized representative of the demanding government and his conveyance out of the asylum country may, and, as far as mandatory, must, be complied with; and, where extradition is not completed within the time limited therefor, accused is entitled to be discharged unless good cause to the contrary is shown; but the secretary of state is not obliged to order the delivery of the committed person to a representative of the foreign government, it being permissible for him to review the evidence before, and the opinion of, the committing magistrate and decide that the case is not one calling for surrender.

Under the federal statute, 18 U.S.C.A. § 3186, which continues the procedure established by judicial decisions under extradition treaties prior to its enactment, the secretary of state is authorized to order the person committed by an extradition magistrate to be delivered to an authorized representative of the foreign government, to be tried for the crime of which such person shall be accused, and such person is required to be delivered up accordingly.⁷⁷ It was at first held that the executive had merely a ministerial duty in the matter.⁷⁸ It is now well established, however, that the executive has power to revise the opinion of the extradition magistrate,⁷⁹ either on the ground that the case is not within the treaty,⁸⁰ or on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to establish the charge under the treaty,⁸¹ or on the fact that the charge for which the extradition magistrate had committed accused was not embraced in the requisition of the foreign government for the extradition of the fugitive.⁸² Even where a court has refused to discharge accused in habeas corpus proceedings, the secretary of state may review the evidence before the magistrate and decide whether the case presented is one calling for the surrender of accused to the authorities of the foreign country.⁸³

Whether an indictment or warrant of arrest in the demanding country is a condition precedent to action by the secretary of state is considered supra § 32. The necessity of a requisition is discussed supra § 33.

Time for completing extradition. A federal statute, 18 U.S.C.A. § 3188, providing that, if the prisoner is not delivered up and conveyed out of the United States within two calendar months after commitment, over and above the time actually required to convey him from the jail to which he was committed, by the readiest way out of the United States, it shall be lawful for any judge of the United States, or of any state, on application made to him by or in behalf of the prisoner, and on proof that reasonable notice of the intention to make such application has been given to the secretary of state, to order the prisoner to be discharged, unless sufficient cause is shown to such judge why such discharge ought not to be ordered, clearly indicates the purpose of congress to require prompt action, on the part of representatives of this government and of the demanding government, in completing extradition,⁸⁴ and it is construed to be tantamount to a mandate requiring discharge unless sufficient cause to the contrary is shown.⁸⁵

It is not incumbent on petitioner to show a sufficient cause for extending the benefits of the statute,⁸⁶ but, on the contrary, the burden is on those who resist the petition to present evidence which would justify the judge in withholding the discharge after the expiration of the time limited.⁸⁷

The fact that at the time of the application an agent from the government requesting the extradition is on his way to remove the prisoner is not sufficient cause when there is no satisfactory evidence why the coming of the officer has been so long delayed.⁸⁸ On finding that the delay is not attributable to any efforts on the part of the prisoner to postpone the time when he should actually be delivered to an authorized representative of the foreign government, the responsibility of the judge ends and it is not his province further to search for the cause of the delay.⁸⁹

Extradition from foreign country. Provision is made by statute, 18 U.S.C.A. § 3192, for the transportation and safekeeping of a person delivered by a foreign government to an agent of the United States, for the purpose of being brought within the United States and tried for the crime of which he is duly accused.⁹⁰

Articles in possession of accused. A provision common to extradition treaties is that all articles found in the possession of accused, whether being the proceeds of the crime charged, or material as evidence in making proof of the crime, shall as far as practicable and in conformity with law be given up when the extradition takes place. A proviso is generally inserted that the rights of third parties to such articles shall nevertheless be respected.⁹¹

§ 45. Costs and Expenses

Payment or reimbursement of costs and expenses in an international extradition is made by the demanding government. Where extradition is made from a foreign country of an offender against a state law, the question of recovery for services and expenses by an officer against the state or country is governed by local statutes and the proper construction thereof.

Every treaty of extradition to which the United States is a party contains a provision that the expenses of extradition shall be borne by the demanding government,⁹² and it is the practice for the demanding government to defray the expenses of the proceedings whether the fugitive is eventually surrendered or not. In several of our treaties the proviso is added that the demanding government shall not be compelled to bear any expense for the services of such officers of the government from which extradition is sought as receive a fixed salary, and that in cases where such officers receive only fees, the charge for their services shall not exceed the fees to which they would be entitled under the laws of the country for services rendered in ordinary criminal proceedings. The magistrate is required to certify witness' fees and costs of every nature, including his own fees, to the secretary of state, who is authorized to allow payment thereof out of the appropriation to defray the expenses of the judiciary, and to obtain reimbursement of the amount to be paid to the United States from the foreign government by whom the proceedings may have been instituted, see 18 U.S.C.A. § 3195.

In the United States the expenses incurred in securing the extradition from foreign countries of offenders against the federal laws are borne by the government of the United States, an annual appropriation being made, "for actual expenses incurred in bringing home from foreign countries persons charged with crime." Where the offense is against the law of a state or territory the expenses are paid by the state or territory.⁹³

A treaty provision⁹⁴ that on extradition the expense of apprehension and delivery shall be borne by the "party who makes the requisition, and receives the fugitive," has been held to refer to the contracting parties to the treaty, and has no reference to any question which may arise between the government which receives the fugitive and its officers or citizens.⁹⁵

A person named by the governor and by the president of the United States to receive from the Canadian authorities and return to a particular county under the extradition treaty between the United States and Great Britain one charged with crime in that county cannot hold the state or county for expenses and services in securing the return of the prisoner under a statute providing that such expenses shall be paid for "removing any person charged with having committed . . . any offence in this state from another State into this State for trial."⁹⁶ On the other hand, a statute forbidding an officer to ask or receive any fee or compensation for expenses incurred in procuring from the government a demand on the executive authority of a state or territory or of a foreign government does not apply to international extradition proceedings.⁹⁷

The agent representing the state is the only person who can make expenditures in extradition proceedings which the county from which the fugitive fled will be required to repay; and, where the county has paid such agent, it will not be called on to reimburse its county attorney for expenses incurred by him in the proceedings.⁹⁸

Witnesses for indigent defendant. Effect is accorded a statute, 18 U.S.C.A. § 3191, providing that, where, by order of the judge or commissioner in a proceeding for extradition to a foreign country, witnesses are subpoenaed for a prisoner who is not possessed of sufficient means, and is actually unable to pay the fees of such witnesses, the costs incurred by the process, and the fees of witnesses, shall be paid in the same manner as similar fees are paid in the case of witnesses subpoenaed in behalf of the United States.⁹⁹

§ 46. Rights and Liabilities of Accused after Surrender

A person extradited from a foreign country cannot be tried for a prior offense other than the one charged in the extradition proceedings until, after his release or trial on such charge, he has been allowed the time specified by treaty, or a reasonable time, to return to the country from which he was extradited. There is a like immunity from arrest in a civil action, and also one from extradition to a third country unless the government which granted the original extradition consents to the reextradition.

A person who has been brought within the jurisdiction of the court by virtue of proceedings under an extradition treaty can be tried only for one of the offenses described in that treaty, and for the offense with which he is charged in the proceedings for his extradition, until a reasonable time and opportunity have been given him, after his release or trial on such charge, to return to the country from whose asylum he has been taken, or, if the treaty definitely fixes the time for this purpose, until such time has elapsed,¹ although there are some early cases which seem to hold a contrary view.²

If the United States tries the fugitive for a crime other than the one for which extradition was granted, it violates the contractual obligations of the treaty and the courts will be without jurisdiction over him, unless he waives such issue.^{2,5} It has also been held, however, that the immunity from trial for any other offense than that for which extradition has been granted cannot be waived by accused since an individual cannot release the government from the obligations with reference to fugitives from justice which it has assumed toward other nations with which it has entered into extradition treaties.³

The remedy generally pursued in cases of detention which are illegal by reason of the fact that accused is held for a crime other than that for which he was extradited is by plea in abatement or objection to the jurisdiction of the trial court,⁴ or a motion in arrest of judgment,⁵ but on a failure of the state court to protect the right of accused in this regard resort may be had to the United States courts.⁶

The fact that a crime is included in a crime specified in the extradition treaty does not authorize trial and conviction therefor.⁷ However, various matters are immaterial and do not preclude trial and conviction, such as the fact that different names are applied to the alleged criminal act in the two countries,⁸ a slight variance between the wording of the information in the extradition proceedings and the indictment on which the fugitive is tried,⁹ and the fact that certain property described in the indictment on which the extradition proceeding was grounded is of less value than the amount alleged.¹⁰

The finding of a new indictment to remedy a technical defect in a former one does not charge another and different offense so as to prevent his trial on the good indictment of a defendant who has been extradited from a foreign country on a defective one;¹¹ and, where the complaint or indictment is quashed for technical defects after accused has been returned from a foreign country by virtue of an extradition warrant, it is no violation of the prisoner's rights to hold him until a new complaint can be filed or new indictment can be returned on the same facts.¹²

As long as the prisoner is tried on the facts which appeared in evidence before the commissioner who committed him for extradition, and on one of the charges for which he was surrendered, it is immaterial whether he is indicted on all of such charges.¹³ Where a person is extradited as an accomplice in the commission of the crime of embezzlement, his trial for embezzlement is not a trial for an offense different from that for which he is extradited.¹⁴

In no event is there any objection to the trial of the fugitive for an offense committed subsequent to his extradition,¹⁵ nor has an extradited person a right to be tried on the offense for which he was extradited before he is tried for an offense committed subsequent to his extradition,¹⁶ but a fugitive extradited on a pending indictment may not be imprisoned in the demanding country on a previous conviction.¹⁷

Under a treaty which contained a provision prohibiting trial or punishment for any other offense than that for which extradition has been granted until accused shall have had an opportunity to return to the country from which he has been extradited, it was held that a person who while at liberty on bail goes to the country from which he was extradited and subsequently voluntarily returns cannot be arrested for another offense committed prior to his extradition, but is entitled to a reasonable time to depart to the country from which he was surrendered, after his discharge from custody or imprisonment on account of the offense for which he has been extradited.¹⁸

However, where an indicted person who has escaped to a foreign country and against whom an extradition warrant has been issued returns to this country voluntarily, under an agreement that he shall be tried only for the offense for which he has been indicted, and he is thereupon tried and convicted, the objection that the crime for which he was tried was not an extraditable offense must be raised at the trial in order to be available.¹⁹ A fugitive who after the institution of extradition proceedings returns voluntarily is not entitled to immunity from prosecution for an offense other than that which was the basis of the extradition proceedings.²⁰

Extradition to third country. After a person has been extradited from a foreign country and discharged, he cannot, within the time allowed by treaty for return to the asylum country, be extradited to a third country for a prior crime other than the one specified in the original extradition,²¹ unless the country from which he was originally extradited consents to the reextradition.²²

Arrest in civil action. An extradited person, after his acquittal of the charge on which he was surrendered, is not liable to arrest in a civil action, before the expiration of a reasonable time for his return to the country from which he was extradited,²³ although there are some decisions to the contrary.²⁴

A person who has been discharged in proceedings for extradition to a foreign country may be arrested in a civil action in a state wherein he was brought by virtue of the warrant in the extradition proceedings when the civil action is not prosecuted by complainant in the extradition proceedings.²⁵

§ 47. — Effect of Illegal Extradition

A completed international extradition is not subject to attack in the courts of the demanding country. Even though a person has been brought into the country by force or stratagem, and without reference to an extradition treaty, he is within the jurisdiction of domestic courts so as to be liable to trial on a regular indictment and imprisonment under a valid judgment and sentence.

The decision of the courts of the asylum country as to whether a fugitive shall be surrendered and whether the offense charged is within the terms of an extradition treaty is final, and the question cannot again be raised in the courts of the demanding country after extradition.²⁶ The regularity of the proceedings in the asylum country leading up to the issuance of the warrant and surrender will not be examined into in the courts of the demanding country.²⁷ So, too, in the tribunals of his own country, the surrendered fugitive cannot question the good faith of the extradition proceedings.²⁸

EXTRAORDINARY.

As a Noun

Something not ordinary; especially, an extraordinary expense or allowance; specifically, in England, any allowance made to troops beyond the customary gross paid.¹²

As an Adjective

While the word "extraordinary" is comprehensive and flexible in meaning,^{12.5} it is not a word of art.^{12.10} It includes all occurrences, events, and phenomena that are beyond the usual and ordinary,¹³ but it does not always connote some event or occurrence of shattering or staggering magnitude.^{13.5} The term presupposes other like occurrences, although rare or infrequent.^{13.10}

The word "extraordinary" is defined as meaning above ordinary; so in an eminent degree;¹⁴ being beyond or out of the common order or rule; not of the usual, customary, or regular kind; not ordinary;¹⁵ exceeding the common degree or measure;¹⁶ not greater or less, since a thing may be extraordinary for greatness or for littleness or for neither;¹⁷ not usual;¹⁸ outside of the ordinary;¹⁹ hence, rare, remarkable, uncommon,²⁰ unusual,²¹ wonderful.²² Also, employed for an exceptional purpose or on a special occasion.²³

The term has been held synonymous with "unusual."²⁴

It has been described as the antithesis of "customary,"²⁵ the antonym of "ordinary,"²⁶ and has EXTRATERRITORIAL. Beyond the territory.³² term see 25 C.J. p 298 note 79.

For reference to some specific applications of the

"Extraterritoriality" is, as is shown in Conflict of Laws § 6, the exercise by a state of its jurisdiction beyond its boundaries over its nationals who, for the time being, may be sojourning in the territory of another state.

The nature, origin, history, and operation of the doctrine are discussed at length in 25 Corpus Juris pages 299-331 inclusive, to which reference is here made. Reference is also made to the titles International Law § 9 wherein is discussed questions of extraterritorial rights and jurisdiction; Adoption of Children § 3 b for the extraterritorial law of adoption; Ambassadors and Consuls § 12 for the privileges, immunities, and disabilities of foreign diplomatic officers and consuls, and § 18 for matters concerning consular courts; Conflict of Laws § 6 b for extraterritorial domicile; Criminal Law § 28 for the extraterritorial operation of criminal laws, and § 138 d for the jurisdiction of the courts of the sovereignty to punish crimes committed on its vessels within the territorial limits of another sovereignty; Divorce §§ 326-353 for the conclusiveness and effect of foreign divorces; Extradition §§ 24-47 for international extradition; and Marriage § 4, as to the law governing foreign marriages.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

The doctrine of extraterritoriality may apply in the case of aliens subject to deportation and to vessels which are deemed a part of the territory of the country whose flag they fly.³³

EZARDAR. In Hindu law, a farmer or renter of land in the districts of Hindoostan.³⁴

F. The sixth letter of the alphabet.³⁵ As an abbreviation see Abbreviations 1 C.J.S. p 276 note 5.

Under the old English criminal law, this letter was branded upon felons, on their being admitted to the benefit of clergy, also upon those convicted of fights or frays, or falsity.³⁶

FABEADORES. In the ancient Spanish law of Zaragoza, a sort of nominating committee to determine who should enter the lists for office.³⁷

FABRIC. It has been said that in modern use the word "fabric" is applied only to cloth that is woven or knit from fibers, either vegetable or animal;^{37.5} thus, in its primary sense, the term is defined to mean a woven, felted, or knitted material for wear or ornament, as cloth, felt, hosiery or lace; also the material used in its making;³⁸ manufactured cloth; a textile fabric; as silks or other fabrics.^{38.5}

In a secondary sense the word signifies something that has been fabricated, constructed or put together;³⁹ any complex construction; a system built up of co-related parts; structure, edifice, as a social fabric;⁴⁰ anything manufactured, or the structure of anything;⁴¹ also, the act of building; as tithe was received for the fabric of the churches of the poor.⁴²

In its primary sense, the term has been held to include "cotton cloth,"⁴³ but also it has been said that the word is rather a broad one in common speech, and that it is certainly as broad, if not broader, than the word "cloth,"⁴⁴ and that, in its broad sense, it undoubtedly includes a flexible sheet metal.⁴⁵

In concrete construction the term is applied to a union of drawn wires made up in rows.⁴⁶

In acoustics, particularly in the art of sound deadening, "fabric" is a term of art, and has been held not to include sheet metal or cement slabs.⁴⁷

As used in tariff acts see Customs Duties §§ 40, 43.

Phrases employing the word are set out in the subjoined note.⁴⁸

FÁBRICA. In Spanish law, a word used in several senses. In its most common signification it means factory. Such establishments, and the workers therein, particularly child laborers, have been the subject of advanced legislation for many years in Spain.⁴⁹

"Fábrica tabacos"

It is said the words are of common use in the tobacco trade and in Spanish speaking communities, have been

In its ecclesiastical sense, as used in canon law, it means the revenue collected in cathedral, parochial, and other churches for repairs and to defray the expenses of worship; and is also applied to the board or body administering such revenues and to the act of applying them to their proper use.⁵⁰

In old English law, the Latin word "fabrica" was used as meaning the making or coining of money.⁵¹

FABRICARE. Latin, to make. Applied, in old English law, to a lawful coining, and also to the unlawful making or counterfeiting of coin. Used in an indictment for forging a bill of lading.⁵²

FABRICATE. In its primary sense the word "fabricate" is defined as meaning to build, construct, form by art and labor, or form into a whole by joining the parts; to frame, make, manufacture, or produce, as to fabricate a bridge or ship, to fabricate woollens;⁵³ to frame, build, forge; to make, shape, or prepare according to standardized specifications, so as to be interchangeable; to construct or build up into a whole by uniting interchangeable or standardized parts often made elsewhere.^{53.5}

In a derived sense "fabricate" means to invent or contrive, devise falsely, concoct, forge, as to fabricate a lie or a story or to fabricate a report.^{53.10} In this latter sense, the word implies fraud or falsehood; a false or fraudulent concoction, knowing it to be wrong.⁵⁴

In English criminal law, the word has been said to import a criminal intention—a mens rea, a wrongful act, an act done with a mens rea, fraud or falsehood, a false or fraudulent concoction, knowing it to be wrong and contrary to statute.⁵⁵

In its primary sense, the word has been held synonymous with "construct" see the C.J.S. definition of that term. While "manufacture" and "fabricate" have meanings and applications which may differ, yet they are often, and in their broadest sense, interchangeable in meaning, the definition in any particular instance depending on the environment of the particular use of either.⁵⁶

Fabricating. In a particular context, "fabricating" does not imply or signify "manufacturing" but the meaning of the term is restricted to cutting, carving, dressing, shaping, and working over stone.⁵⁷

Fabricator. A fabricator of steel products is one who contracts to construct a specific product, such as a building, bridge, or other structure, according to special design and specification.^{57.5}

Phrases employing the word "fabricate" in its various forms are set out in the note.⁵⁸

FABRICATION. The act of framing or constructing; construction, formation, or manufacture.⁵⁹ In a particular connection, the term has been used in a broad sense as including "reworking and assembling."⁶⁰

It is often used as interchangeable in meaning with "manufacture."⁶¹ applied to all known manufactured products of the plant.

Phrase construed

"Fabrication of tangible personal property," as a statutory term applied to services performed on materials which consumers furnish either directly or indirectly for the fabrication work, and held to constitute a sale within the statute. Cal.—Bigsby v. Johnson, 99 P.2d 268, 270.

In the fabrication of steel, there are two general classes of fabrication, structural fabrication and plate fabrication. Structural fabrication includes bridges, steel buildings, and structural frames. Plate fabrication is somewhat more diversified and consists of pressure vessels such as cylindrical containers, bubble and cracking towers used in the oil industry, penstock or piping, well casing, corrugated culverts, and other somewhat similar articles.

FABULA. In old European law, a contract or formal agreement; particularly used in the Lombardic and Visigothic laws to denote a marriage contract or a will.⁶²

FACCIÓN DE TESTAMENTO. Spanish; the capacity to make a will (activa) or to receive under a will (pasiva).⁶³

FACE. Presence; view, or sight;⁶⁴ the outward appearance or aspect of a thing; the surface of anything, especially the front, upper, or outer part or surface, or that which particularly offers itself to the view of a spectator.⁶⁵

In commercial law, the words of a written paper in their apparent or obvious meaning, as, face of a note, bill, bond, check, draft, judgment, record, or contract;⁶⁶ that which is shown by the mere language employed, without any explanation, modification, or addition from extrinsic facts or evidence.⁶⁷ Also the principal sum which it expresses to be due or payable, without any additions in the way of interest or costs;⁶⁸ the sum less interest which appears to be due by an instrument or record.⁶⁹

In a particular connection, the term has been held identical in meaning with "principal."⁷⁰

Face value. The value expressed on the face of a writing in the commodity in which it is payable;⁷¹ the value which can be ascertained from the language of the instrument without any aid from extrinsic facts or evidence;⁷² and, when applied to interest-bearing notes and like instruments, the phrase has been held to mean the amount named on the notes;⁷³ the principal thereof plus accrued interest to a given date;⁷⁴ the value, written or printed on the face of an instrument and any unmatured coupons attached thereto, without reference to its actual or market value.⁷⁵

The term has been held equivalent to "par value."⁷⁶

It has been distinguished from "actual value"⁷⁷ and from "par value."⁷⁸

Other phrases are listed in the note.⁷⁹ Still other phrases as to which more recent adjudications have not been found see 25 C.J. p 333 notes 42-50.

FACE AU FLEUVE or FACE, and FRENTE AL RIO, or FRENTE. Literally in French and Spanish conveyances, respectively, "Front to the river," or "front." The words have been held to indicate that the land to which the words are applied extends to, or is bounded by, the river, rather than merely facing toward it.⁸⁰

FACENDA and FACENDERA. In old Spanish law, personal labor and public works.⁸¹

FACERE. The present infinitive of the Latin verb, meaning to do, to make.⁸²

Other parts of the verb used in legal terms or phrases are: (1) The present indicative first person singular "facio," I do, I make, or I cause.⁸³ (2) The present subjunctive second person singular "facias," that you cause, that you may cause, or that you may do.⁸⁴ (3) The gerund "faciendo," in or by doing or paying; in some activity.⁸⁵

FACERÍA. In the Spanish law of Navarre, the partnership or community of pasture among neighboring towns.⁸⁶

FACIAL. Pertaining to the face, as facial expression.⁸⁷

FACIAS and FACIENDO. See the definition Facere ante.

FACIES. Latin, the face or countenance; the exterior appearance or view; hence, contemplation or study of a thing on its external or apparent side. Thus "prima facie" means at the first inspection, on a preliminary or exterior scrutiny. When we speak of a prima facie case, we mean one which, on its own showing, on a first examination, or without investigating any alleged defenses, is apparently good and maintainable.⁸⁸

FACILE. Latin, literally "easily." In Scotch law, easily persuaded, easily imposed upon.⁸⁹

FACILIS EST LAPsus JUVENTUTIS.⁹⁰

FACILITATE. It has been said that the word "facilitate" is a term that is used in everyday transactions between people.^{90.5}

The word is defined as meaning to make easy or less difficult;⁹¹ to free from difficulty or impedi-

80. As indicating a riparian estate

"In French and Spanish conveyances, both public and private, the words face au fleuve, face, frente al rio, frente, front to the river, or front, exclusively designate estates bounded by the river, which in the country are otherwise called riparian, bound to the repair of the road, its ditches, bridges, and levees, and to supply ground for either or the whole of these, when that which they cover is carried away by the water. . . . We conclude that, on the inspection of the deed . . . the words front to the river, used therein, were intended to denote a riparian estate bordering on the river." La.—La Branche v. Montegut, 17 So. 247, 248, 47 La. Ann. 674—Morgan v. Livingston, 6 Mart. 19, 224, 225, 226.

Literally, "I do that you may give." A species of contract in the civil law, being one of the innominate contracts, which occurs when a man agrees to perform anything for a price either specifically mentioned or left to the determination of the law to set a value on it, as when a servant hires himself to his master for certain wages or an agreed sum of money; also the consideration of that species of contract.

Literally "I do that you may do." The consideration of that species of contract in the civil law, or the contract itself, being one of the innominate contracts, which occurs when I agree with a man to do his work for him if he will do mine for me; or if two persons agree to marry together, or to do any other positive acts on both sides; or it may be to forbear on one side in consideration of something done on the other.

FACILITY. The word "facility" is derived from the Latin "facilis," meaning capable of being made or done; hence easy.^{91.40} It is not a technical word, but one in common use, and its meaning is to be found in the sense attached to it by approved usage.⁹² It is a very inclusive term, embracing anything which aids or makes easier the performance of a duty.⁹³

The word "facility" is defined as meaning the quality of being easily performed, ease in performance, or the means by which the performance of anything is rendered more easy;⁹⁴ that which promotes the ease of any action;^{94.5} operation, transaction, or course of conduct;^{94.10} a convenient means;⁹⁵ an aid;^{95.5} advantage, aid, or valuable aid, assistance, convenience, or help;⁹⁶ advantage;^{96.5} opportunity;^{96.10} ease, freedom from difficulty.^{96.15}

The term is also defined as meaning that which aids, assists, or makes more easy the acquisition of knowledge.⁹⁷

"Facility" has been held to be equivalent to, or synonymous with, "aid," "assistance," and "help."^{97.5}

It has been distinguished from "equipment" see the C.J.S. definition of that word, and "instrumentality."⁹⁸

Facilities. The word "facilities" is generally regarded as a widely inclusive term, embracing everything which aids or makes easier the performance of the activities involved in the business of a person or corporation.^{98.5} It means, as applied to public agencies or utilities, everything incident to the general, prompt, safe, and impartial performance of the duties to the public at large imposed by the state, in the proper exercise of its police power, on transportation or transmission companies; and, specifically applied to carriers, everything necessary

State of mind as fact

(1) "The condition or state of mind at a given time is a fact. If any emotion is felt, as joy, grief, or anger, the feeling is a fact. If the operations of the mind produce an effect, as knowledge, skill, intention, this effect on the mind is a fact. When the mental processes lead up to and produce a desire or intention to do a certain thing, such state of mind is a fact. Willfulness is a desire or intention to produce a certain result; hence willfulness is a fact." Ind.—Barr v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co., 37 N.E. 814, 815, 10 Ind.App. 433.

Fact, as distinguished from law, is that out of which the point of law arises; that which is asserted to be or not to be, and is to be presumed or proved to be or not to be, for the purpose of applying or refusing to apply a rule of law.²⁶ It has been said that the word, as employed in the legal sense, includes those conclusions reached by the trier from sifting testimony, weighing evidence, and passing on the credit of the witnesses, and does not denote those inferences drawn by the trial court from the facts ascertained and settled by it.²⁷

For references to some specific applications or uses of the term see 25 C.J. p 335 note 81.

"Fact" has been held to be equivalent to, or synonymous with, "circumstance" and "deed," see the C.J.S. definitions of these terms, and also "evidence" see Evidence § 2, "matter,"²⁸ and "point."²⁹

"Fact" has been compared with, or distinguished from, "allegation" and "circumstance," see the C. J.S. definitions of these terms, and also "evidence," see Evidence § 2, "inference,"^{29.5} and "law."³⁰

The terms "fact" and "truth" are often used in common parlance as synonymous, but as employed with reference to pleadings they are widely different.³¹

Material fact. The term has been defined generally in American Law Institute Restatement, Torts § 538, as a fact, the existence or nonexistence of which is a matter to which a reasonable man would attach importance in determining his choice of action in the transaction in question. Other authorities define it more specifically, as a fact which constitutes substantially the consideration of a contract;³² a fact of such a nature as to have induced action on the part of the complaining party;³³ also, a fact that is essential to the claim or defense, application, etc., without which it could not be supported;³⁴ such as is necessary to determine the issue;³⁵ or such as might influence a jury in its decision.³⁶

What are material facts with reference to avoidance and forfeiture of insurance policies see the C.J.S. title Insurance §§ 477, 490, 494, 584, 594, 646, 648.

(1) Factor

A factor, or a commission merchant or consignee, as he is sometimes called, is an agent who, in pursuance of his usual business and for a compensation, sells goods or merchandise intrusted to his possession for that purpose by or for the owner.

The word "factor" has a fairly well defined meaning.¹ A factor is an agent who, in pursuance of his usual trade or business, and for a compensation commonly called factorage or commission, sells goods or merchandise consigned or intrusted to his possession for that purpose by or for the owner.²

Although a factor usually sells only goods intrusted to him for that purpose, under some definitions the agency may also include the purchase and sale of such goods.³

Other terms sometimes used as synonymous with or as a general equivalent for "factor," are "commission merchant"⁴ and "consignee."⁵

Joint owner as factor. A person having a joint interest in the property to be sold may occupy with relation to the other owners the position of a factor.⁶

Common carrier as factor. A common carrier may be a factor, as where he transports goods to a distant place and undertakes to sell them there; in such a case he acts in a dual capacity, the one as a carrier in the transportation of the goods, the other as a factor while engaged in the sale of the goods.⁷

(2) Factorage or Commission

The term "factorage" or "commission" usually indicates the allowance given to a factor as compensation for his services.

The term "factorage" or "commission" is usually used to indicate the allowance given to a factor as compensation for his services.⁸ A del credere commission, correctly speaking, is the additional compensation given by the principal to the factor for his guaranty of payment;⁹ but the term is sometimes also applied to the contract itself.¹⁰

(3) Other Terms

The goods received by a factor for sale are called a "consignment." A "mortgage-marketing contract" is an indenture of dual character. "Return commissions" are an allowance to cover expenses of the consignee while goods are in his charge.

An article or collection of goods sent to a factor for sale is called a "consignment."¹¹

The term "del credere factor" is defined infra subdivision b (2) of this section.

A "mortgage-marketing contract" is an indenture of dual character, securing to the mortgagee the exclusive right to furnish supplies essential for packing a crop and the right to market it on a commission basis, and creating a lien in favor of the mortgagee on the mortgagor's realty and crop.¹²

tion of Farmers, 197 A. 554, 135 Me. 386.

"Return commissions" is said to mean that on goods taken away by a consignor before sale, the consignee receives an equitable allowance to cover the expense of handling, insuring, and storing the goods while in his charge.^{12.5}

b. Classes and Kinds of Factors

Factors are sometimes classified as "home" and "foreign" factors. A del credere factor is one who expressly engages to pay to his principal the price of the goods sold by him, if the purchaser fails to do so.

A factor is called a "home factor" when he resides in the same state or country as his principal.¹³ If he resides in a different state or country, he is called a "foreign factor."¹⁴ As understood in marine matters, however, a "foreign factor" is a person who has charge of the cargo, to handle it, dispose of it, and convert it into money or exchange it for other property.¹⁵

A del credere factor, or a factor with a del credere commission or agency, is one who, in consideration of a higher compensation, expressly engages to pay to his principal the price of all goods sold by himself, if the purchaser fails so to do.¹⁶

c. Distinctions

A factor is to be distinguished from a person occupying the position merely of an ordinary agent, banker, clerk, employee, merchant, purchaser, traveling salesman, trustee, warehouseman, or other similar position; and a consignment for sale must be distinguished from a sale.

The term "factor," in its strict and technical sense, is not properly applicable to a person occupying the position merely of an ordinary commercial banker,¹⁷ merchant,¹⁸ officer,¹⁹ or trustee;²⁰ and in at least some of its characteristics the agency of factor is to be distinguished from that of a broker, see Brokers § 4, "forwarding agent,"²¹ "insurance agent,"²² "warehouseman,"²³ traveling salesman,²⁴ collecting agent,²⁵ or clerk or employee,²⁶ and from the relation of debtor and creditor,²⁷ or joint own-

Factor and ordinary agent. A factor is to be distinguished from a person occupying the position merely of an ordinary agent.^{28.5} While in a sense, as appears infra subdivision e of this section, a factor or commission merchant is the agent of the consignor, he does not conduct an agency or business for the principal at the factor's place of business at his own risk,²⁹ and the proceeds of the sale do not become the exclusive property of the consignor.³⁰ The important difference, however, between a factor and an ordinary agent is that the agent need not have possession of the property of his principal, while the factor must be in possession;³¹ and under some definitions other and greater powers are conferred on a factor than on an agent.³²

A del credere factor is distinguished from other agents in that he guarantees that those persons to whom he sells will perform the contracts which he makes with them.³³

Factor and bailee. Although a factor is regarded as a bailee of the property, see infra § 40, he differs from an ordinary bailee mainly in that he is authorized to sell in the ordinary course of business, see Bailments § 1 c.

Consignment for sale or sale. It has been held that a factor who has made advances has the rights of a purchaser;³⁴ but ordinarily a consignment for sale such as will give rise to the relation of principal and factor must be distinguished from a sale.³⁵ In a sale, title passes to the buyer, while in a consignment to a factor title remains in the principal, but the possession passes to the factor,³⁶ and the factor is liable, not to pay a price, but to account for the proceeds of the goods when sold;³⁷ and if it appears that the depositor of the goods reserves a right to take them back, the transaction is considered a consignment and the consignee a factor.³⁸

The transaction is a sale, and not a consignment to a factor for sale, if it appears that it is the intention of the parties that the title to the goods is to pass to the party receiving them, for a price to be paid by him, without any reservation by the depositor of the right to take back the goods,³⁹ or sale where dealer was under no obligation to account for proceeds when sold.

(2) Defendant, a sugar refiner, contracted to receive from a second party shipments of raw sugar aggregating a stated quantity, to make advances on and refine the same, and to account to the shipper for the proceeds of the refined sugar after deducting its advances and charges. After shipments had been received and some of them treated, defendant executed to complainant bank, which had also made advances to the shipper, trust certificates, each covering a single shipment, acknowledging its receipt from complainant and agreeing after it was refined and sold "to hand over the proceeds of such sale, after deducting advances made by us and our charges for refining and handling in accord with the contract" between defendant and the shipper. In a suit by complainant for an accounting, it appeared that there was a surplus on some shipments after deducting advances and charges and on others a deficiency, and that on the aggregate there was a large deficiency due defendant from the shipper. It was held that the certificates did not create a relation of principal and factor between complainant and defendant.

where the consignee is to sell on terms fixed by himself, and is bound to pay to the consignor a fixed price.⁴⁰

In determining whether a particular transaction is a sale or a consignment to a factor for sale, the intention of the parties must prevail,⁴¹ although their opinion as to the effect of the transaction is not binding on the court.⁴² The rule that, where a person receives property which he is not bound to return in the identical form, but may account therefor in money or other property, the transaction amounts to a sale does not apply to a consignment to sell made to a factor.⁴³

Del credere agency and sale. Where a contract provides for the sale of goods on commission at prices fixed by the consignor and returns at stated periods, the consignee guaranteeing payment, the relation created is that of agency on a del credere commission and not that of vendor and purchaser;⁴⁴ but where the consignee gives an acceptance for the value of the goods and agrees to account for the whole price, guaranteeing the sales, and is to receive a commission, the transaction is a consignment on sale as distinguished from a consignment on a del credere commission.⁴⁵

d. Elements of Relation

To constitute a consignee a factor it is essential that he have possession of the goods to be sold, that the goods are intrusted to him to sell, that he is engaged in the business of selling, and that he is to receive compensation for his services.

Quoted in: U.S.—McCarley v. Foster-Milburn Co., D.C. N.Y., 93 F.Supp. 421, 423.

It is not essential that the property be consigned directly by the principal in order to make the consignee a factor;⁴⁶ but it is essential that the consignee have the actual or constructive possession of the goods or merchandise which he is employed to sell.⁴⁷ It is a sufficient possession, however, that the property is in his own warerooms,⁴⁸ or that he holds the invoices and bills of lading representing the goods, so that he has the power to acquire and deliver possession to the purchaser,⁴⁹ unless he holds such invoice or bill of lading for a special purpose, other than that of sale.⁵⁰

It is also essential that the goods are intrusted to the factor to sell;⁵¹ that he is engaged in the business of selling or of buying and selling such goods and merchandise for others;⁵² and that he is to receive compensation for his services.⁵³ A person is not a factor who has no right, under a special agreement as a factor, to sell or dispose of property in his charge, and has no control over it when it is in a condition for sale.⁵⁴

Form of compensation. Although commissions constitute the ordinary method in which the remuneration of factors is provided, the compensation may be provided for by allowing the factor to retain the excess of the proceeds over a specified price,⁵⁵ or a share of the net profits,⁵⁶ or even by way of a fixed salary.⁵⁷

Effect of labor on goods. A person to whom property is consigned for sale is none the less a factor because he bestows labor on it before it is ready for sale;⁵⁸ and this is true although the character of the property is entirely changed,⁵⁹ as where milk is converted into butter and cheese,⁶⁰ or where animals are slaughtered and manufactured into meat.⁶¹

Business in premises leased in principal's name. The fact that the house in which the factor transacts business is leased in the name of the principal does not preclude his being a factor.⁶²

e. Nature of Relation

The relationship of principal and factor is of a fiduciary character, and is one of agency. The relationship may be changed by agreement of the parties; but the fact that a factor is acting under a del credere commission does not affect the ordinary relations existing between him and his principal.

The relation of principal and factor has long been regarded as beneficial in the transaction of business,⁶³ and is of a fiduciary character,⁶⁴ the factor being regarded in some instances, as where he sells in his own name, as a quasi trustee⁶⁵ or a trustee of an express trust.⁶⁶ It is competent for the parties to change by agreement the ordinary legal relations existing between factor and principal;⁶⁷ this must be done by an agreement which clearly points to that result, otherwise it will be presumed that their dealings are governed by the rules of law ordinarily applicable to dealings between principal and factor.⁶⁸

Agency. The relation of principal and factor is in its nature one of agency;⁶⁹ and in order to preserve this agency relationship it is not necessary that the factor advertise the fact of his agency to his customers, that the goods be segregated and marked as goods of the principal, or that the proceeds from sales be held separately by the factor;⁷⁰ neither is the fact that advances are made by the factor on the goods consigned inconsistent with an agency relationship.⁷¹ Indeed, if the factor makes advances on the goods consigned, with the consent of or by the direction of the principal, an agency coupled with an interest arises.⁷²

Del credere factor. The fact that a factor is acting under a del credere commission does not affect the ordinary relations existing between him and his principal; except for the additional security afforded the principal, their reciprocal rights, duties, and liabilities remain the same.⁷³

§ 2. Regulation of Business

The state may regulate the business of a factor; and statutes making such regulations have generally been held valid.

While there is no prohibition in positive law or in public policy against the handling of goods on consignment,⁷⁴ it is within the police power of the state to regulate the business or occupation of a factor or commission merchant,⁷⁵ and statutes making such regulations have generally been held constitutional and valid.⁷⁶ Such statutes have as their object the protection of persons dealing with factors and commission merchants,⁷⁷ and they apply to all factors or commission merchants who come within their terms.⁷⁸

Regulation of "market agencies" under the Packers and Stockyards Act is considered in Agriculture §§ 65-74.

§ 3. — Licenses and Bonds

- a. Licenses
- b. Bonds

a. Licenses

Under some statutes or ordinances, a person is required to obtain a license and pay a tax or fee for the privilege of engaging in the business of a factor.

Under some statutes or ordinances, a person who wishes to engage in the business of a factor or commission merchant,⁷⁹ or in the business of a commission merchant selling farm products or prod-

Kan.—Simmons v. Oatman, 202 P. 977, 110 Kan. 44.

A provision requiring "commission merchants and produce dealers" to obtain a license applies to a produce dealer, although he is not engaged in the business of commission merchant.

Mo.—Kansas City v. Grush, 52 S.W. 286, 151 Mo. 128.

Natural gas company which, as an independent contractor, acted as exclusive sales agency of foreign corporation, through which a type of uce,⁸⁰ is required to obtain a license for conducting such a business. Such statutes and ordinances have generally been held valid and constitutional,⁸¹ despite some authority to the contrary effect.^{81.5} Their object is to protect persons dealing with factors or commission merchants;⁸² and they are to be given a reasonable construction.⁸³

Right to license. To entitle one to a license as a factor or commission merchant, he must comply with all the conditions prescribed by the statute as conditions precedent to his right to engage in such business or occupation.⁸⁴ Accordingly, where the statute so provides, he must make application for the license to a designated board, commission, or officer,⁸⁵ and furnish proof as to his statutory qualifications, such as his financial responsibility.⁸⁶

Merchants selling produce for consumption

Under some statutes an express distinction is made as to merchants engaged in selling produce for consumption, they not being required to obtain a license and comply with other regulations, as is required in the case of merchants conducting the business of receiving and selling produce for resale.

N.Y.—Huson v. Brown, 154 N.Y.S. 131, 90 Misc. 175.

The decision of the licensing authorities in refusing a license may, in a proper case, be reviewed.^{86.5}

Effect of failure to obtain license. Under statutes requiring factors or commission merchants to be licensed, it has been held in some jurisdictions that contracts procured in violation of such regulatory license provisions of the law are void;⁸⁷ but in other jurisdictions such contracts are not regarded as absolute nullities.⁸⁸ In any event, the failure of a commission merchant to procure a license does not prevent him from enforcing a collateral contract against one of his defaulting employees.⁸⁹

License tax or fee. Under some statutes, a factor is required to pay a license tax or fee for the privilege of engaging in the business of a factor.⁹⁰

90. Validity

(1) Statutes imposing a license fee have been held valid where the fee is not oppressive.

b. Bonds

- (1) In general
- (2) Liability on bond
- (3) Remedies

(1) In General

Where the statute so requires, a factor must give a bond for the faithful performance of his contracts.

Under some statutes, a person engaging in the business of a factor or commission merchant,⁹¹ or in the business of a commission merchant selling farm products or produce,⁹² is required to give a bond, executed by a proper surety company,⁹³ for the faithful performance of his contracts; and statutes of this character have generally been held valid and constitutional,⁹⁴ although there is authority to the contrary effect.^{94.5}

Nature of bond. While the bond given by a factor as required by statute is a statutory bond,⁹⁵ it is not an official bond.⁹⁶ A failure to file a bond with the county clerk where required by statute will result in the bond's being treated as nonstatutory.^{96.5} Bonds in excess of the amount provided by statute have also been held to be nonstatutory in so far as they exceed the stated amount.^{96.10}

Construction of bond. Rules governing the construction of statutory bonds in general apply to the construction of factor's or commission merchant's bonds;⁹⁷ and in construing such a bond the statute requiring it must be read into, and considered a part of, the bond itself.⁹⁸

Persons protected by bond. The class of persons protected by a factor's bond depends primarily on the terms of the statute requiring the bond.⁹⁹

Duty of consignor. Under at least one statute, there is no duty on the consignor to take any steps or proceedings to safeguard the surety on the bond against his principal.¹ Thus, the consignor is under no duty to notify the surety of defaults on the part of the commission merchant and thus help to prevent or diminish damage to the surety.²

Producers

Acts 1937 c 17777, requiring citrus fruit dealers, including commission merchants, to give surety bonds before being granted licenses, limits protection of bonds to citrus fruit producers, so that surety on such a dealer's bond is not liable for dealer's failure to account for and pay amounts due to one dealing in, but not producing, such fruits.

Fla.—Pearson v. Columbia Casualty Co., 199 So. 339, 145 Fla. 350.

Vendor of boxes, bales, sacks, etc., was not a "person" with whom vendee, a citrus fruit dealer, dealt in "handling" citrus fruit within statute providing that bond required of citrus fruit dealers was for benefit of any "person" dealt with in "handling" citrus fruit, hence such vendor could not sue on the bond.

Liability not dependent on fraud or negligence of factor.

Cal.—Moulton v. Williams Fruit Corporation, 21 P.2d 936, 218 C. 106.

Effect of waiver of statutory provisions

With respect to liability on statutory bond, the willingness of individuals, purchasing hogs through licensed operator of livestock sales ring, to waive statutory provisions for vaccination of hogs against cholera does not excuse licensee's violation of statute by sale of unvaccinated hogs.

Transaction held not within protection of bond

Unqualified sale of cherries to licensed produce dealers is not within statutory bond covering default of principal engaged in business of buying, selling, and handling of fresh fruits on commission, and hence seller could not recover from surety for dealers' default.

Utah.—Carstensen v. Stratton, 58 P. 2d 1035, 90 Utah 19.

Void guaranty

A surety on bond required of produce dealer under Produce Dealers Act regulating such dealers was not liable to producer on contract of dealer whereby dealer guaranteed price for deciduous fruits without having license required under the Deciduous Fruit Dealers Act to make

The surety will not be held liable where to impose liability would inequitably allow claimant to recoup from the surety an amount for which claimant is himself liable.¹⁰ Where an application for a license has been refused, the bond accompanying the application does not become effective, and the surety will not be liable for acts performed by the applicant without a license.^{10.5}

Period of surety's liability. The surety is liable only for a breach or defalcation which occurs during the term covered by the bond.¹¹ Accordingly, where the factor fails to remit sums due the consignor, the surety is liable for sums which became due and payable during the term of the bond,¹² irrespective of when the goods were consigned;¹³ but he is not liable for sums which became due and payable before the execution of the bond¹⁴ or subsequent to its expiration.¹⁵

Release from liability. While an unauthorized cancellation of the bond by the surety will not release him from liability thereon,¹⁶ the consignor may release the surety from liability to him.¹⁷

(3) Remedies

(a) In general

(b) Action on bond

(a) In General

The usual method of enforcing liability on a factor's bond is by an action brought thereon, although under some statutes preliminary inquisitorial proceedings before a state commission are authorized.

The usual method of enforcing the liability on a factor's or commission merchant's bond is by an action brought on the bond,¹⁸ although in some jurisdictions the statutes authorize inquisitorial proceedings before a state commission or commissioner preliminary to the commencement of suit on the bond.¹⁹ Thus, under at least one statute, the commissioner of agriculture is authorized, on default by a commission merchant in any of the conditions of his bond, to examine claims of consignors and by certificate determine the amounts due thereon,²⁰ and thereafter, as will appear infra subdivision b (3) (b) of this section, he may bring an action on the bond in which his certificate deter-such guaranty, since such contract could not lawfully be made.

Cal.—Brock v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, 75 P.2d 605, 10 C.2d 512.

10. Claim assigned to commission merchant

An action could not be maintained by the state director of agriculture on statutory bond of produce dealers for failure to pay proceeds of sale of fruits taken by dealers on consignment and sold for them by commission merchants, where commission merchants, under their agreement with producer, would profit by any recovery up to amount paid producer, inequitably allowing recoupment from surety an amount for which commission merchants were liable, but the payment of which they avoided by buying out producer and becoming plaintiff in producer's action against them.

Cal.—Brock v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, supra.

11. Cal.—Brock v. A. G. Priest, Inc., 61 P.2d 1183, 17 C.A.2d 328.

Breach discovered after term

Act of commission merchant in obtaining advances on grain consigned to him to be stored and sold on order of consignor, without knowledge and consent of consignor, during term of bond required by statute, constitutes breach thereof, although amount of consignor's loss is not discovered or determined until after such term.

15. Bond expiring before sale made
Where the bond expires after the consignment is made but before sale, the surety is not liable for failure of the factor to remit to the consignor the proceeds of the sale.
Cal.—Brock v. A. G. Priest, Inc., 61 P.2d 1183, 17 C.A.2d 328.

16. Attempted cancellation by surety held ineffective to release surety from liability on bond.

Wash.—Slotemaker v. International Fruit & Produce Co., 287 P. 833, 156 Wash. 574.

17. Acts constituting release

Where producer accepted payment from commission merchants under settlement agreement whereby producer consented to a reversal of judgment against merchants for proceeds of fruit sold by merchants with knowledge that produce dealers who had shipped fruit to merchants had accepted fruit on consignment from producer, and then dismissed the action, producer discharged surety on statutory bond of produce dealer, and hence producer's attempted assignment to merchants of his claim against surety was ineffective.

Proceedings before commission or commissioner as conditions precedent to action on bond see infra subdivision b (3) (b) of this section.

Procedure before commission

Although the statute requires a complaint to be filed, any formal, written, verified information, charging the default complained of, whether labeled complaint or otherwise, will be sufficient to set in motion inquisitorial proceedings before a commission authorized to act; an affidavit will answer the purpose.

Minn.—Atwater Farmers' Co-op. El. Co. v. Enge, 142 N.W. 328, 122 Minn. 316.

Review of commissioner's findings and conclusions

Claimant against bond of wholesale produce dealer whose claim had been disallowed by commissioner of agriculture was not entitled to have review of commissioner's findings and conclusions on his claim except by certiorari.

mining the amounts due is presumptive evidence of the facts therein stated.

(b) Action on Bond

Except as statutes may provide specially, general rules governing actions on bonds apply in an action on a factor's bond.

An action on a factor's or commission merchant's statutory bond may be brought, where the statute so provides, by a particular official,²¹ such as the commissioner or director of agriculture,²² or by the consignor,²³ even though the bond runs to the state.²⁴ Under at least one statute, however, the consignor, not being a party to the bond, cannot maintain an action thereon.²⁵

The action must be brought within the time prescribed by statute,²⁶ and conditions precedent, if any, must be complied with before the action may be maintained.²⁷ In such an action, general rules governing pleadings,²⁸ issues, proof, and variance,²⁹ and the weight and sufficiency of evidence³⁰ ordinarily apply.

Parties defendant. As a general rule, an action on a factor's bond cannot be maintained against one

Statute valid

Statute authorizing commissioner of agriculture to bring action on bond held constitutional.

N.Y.—Baldwin v. Standard Accident Ins. Co. (Olivit Action), 261 N.Y.S. 507, 237 App.Div. 334, affirmed 188 N.E. 71, 262 N.Y. 575.

Reason for rule

Since "in many cases the amount of the farmer's [consignor's] claim would be too small to justify the expense of prosecuting the claim to collect, the Legislature has seen fit to put in part this burden upon the state through its commissioner of agriculture."

N.Y.—Baldwin v. Standard Accident Ins. Co. (Olivit Action), supra.

Failure of factor to make payment

(1) Under a statute so providing, the director of agriculture may bring an action on the bond for the benefit of consignors where the commission merchant fails to pay for farm products consigned to and sold by him. Cal.—Moulton v. Williams Fruit Corporation, 21 P.2d 936, 218 C. 106.

Whitacre v. Hall, 104 P.2d 401, 40 C.A.2d 68, rehearing denied 104 P.2d 660, 40 C.A.2d 68.

(2) Under such a statute the liability of the surety for the commission merchant's failure to make payments ordinarily is one to be enforced by the director of agriculture in an action brought by him and generally cannot be enforced in an action brought by the consignor. Cal.—Whitacre v. Hall, supra.

Consignor injured by factor's fraud

Where the statute so provides, any producer-consignor of farm products claiming to have been injured by the fraud or deceit of a commission merchant may bring an action on the bond against both principal and surety.

Cal.—Moulton v. Williams Fruit Corporation, 21 P.2d 936, 218 C. 106.

26. Statute held not one of limitation

A statute requiring a commission merchant to keep his records for a period of six months is not a limitation on the time within which an action should be commenced on his bond.

Ill.—People ex rel. McLaughlin v. G. H. Cross Co., 198 N.E. 356, 361 Ill. 405, affirmed Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co. v. People of State of Illinois ex rel. McLaughlin, 56 S.Ct. 685, 298 U.S. 155, 80 L.Ed. 1099.

27. Timely notice of dealer's default to Commissioner of Agriculture required.

Minn.—Leasure v. Clarkin, 8 N.W.2d 521, 214 Minn. 420.

Particular acts held not conditions precedent

(1) A statutory provision to the effect that if a licensed commission merchant fails to account for any property consigned to him for sale a consignor may file with the railroad and warehouse commission an affidavit setting forth the facts and thereafter bring an action against the commission merchant's bond, so far as the provision for filing the affidavit is concerned, is merely directory and a failure to file it is not fatal to the right of action on the bond.

Minn.—Kramer Equity Elevator v. Indemnity Ins. Co. of North America, 226 N.W. 396, 178 Minn. 136—Atwater Farmers' Co-op. El. Co. v. Enge, 142 N.W. 328, 122 Minn. 316.

(2) Compliance with Smith-Hurd Rev.St.1931 c 5 § 20, providing a course of procedure when a consignor of farm produce fails to obtain an honest accounting from a commission merchant, is not a condition precedent to an action on a commission merchant's bond brought under the authority of the act, Smith-Hurd Rev.St.1931 c 5 § 17 et seq. for the benefit of consignors.

Ill.—People v. Wirkus' Estate, 265 Ill.App. 248—People v. Frank G. Heilman Co., 263 Ill.App. 514.

Minn.—Kramer Equity Elevator v. Indemnity Ins. Co. of North America, 226 N.W. 396, 178 Minn. 136.

29. What must be proved

Consignors seeking to recover from vegetable factor's surety for failure of factor to turn over to consignors amounts recovered from railroad on claims for damages to vegetables as provided by contract must prove fraud and deceit and that they were injured thereby.

Cal.—Whitacre v. Hall, 104 P.2d 401, 40 C.A.2d 68, rehearing denied 104 P.2d 660, 40 C.A.2d 68.

30. Evidence held sufficient

(1) To sustain verdict or findings. Idaho.—Steel v. Blunck, 295 P. 426, 50 Idaho 244.

Minn.—Trovatten v. Minea, 7 N.W.2d 390, 213 Minn. 544, 144 A.L.R. 1263—Kramer Equity Elevator v. Indemnity Ins. Co. of North America, 226 N.W. 396, 178 Minn. 136.

(2) To show that payments, made to produce dealers by commission merchants were "advances." Cal.—Brock v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, 75 P.2d 605, 10 C.2d 512.

who is not a party thereto.³¹ The factor and surety, being parties to the bond, may be joined as parties defendant,³² but the surety may be sued without joining the factor³³ or his trustee in bankruptcy³⁴ as a party defendant where the bond is joint and several.

Defenses. Any available fact or facts which will defeat the cause of action in whole or in part may be set up as a defense in an action on a factor's bond.³⁵

Burden of proof. Generally, plaintiff has the burden of establishing the facts essential to his recovery;³⁶ but the burden is on defendant, if he relies on such fact, to show that the consignment in question was outside the general business for which the commission merchant was licensed,³⁷ as that the consigned produce was sold by him for consumption as distinguished from a sale for resale.³⁸

Certificate of commissioner as evidence. Under a statute authorizing the commissioner of agriculture, on default by a commission merchant in any of the conditions of his bond, to examine claims of consignors and by certificate determine the amounts due thereon, the certificate so made is, by the terms of the statute, presumptive evidence, in an action on the bond, of the facts therein stated³⁹ and, together with the claim of the consignor attached thereto, may be received in evidence.⁴⁰ Such a statute establishes a rule of evidence, and shifts the burden of proof after the presumption is created.⁴¹ The presumption, however, disappears when substantial evidence to the contrary is presented.⁴²

Costs. Under at least one statute, attorney's fees may be taxed as costs in an action on a factor's bond.⁴³

§ 4. — Offenses and Penalties

A violation of statutes governing the conduct of business by a factor may be made an offense, for which he may be subject to a penalty or other punishment.

Under some statutes which regulate the business of factors, a violation of the provisions of the statute by the factor makes him guilty of an offense,⁴⁴ and subjects him to a penalty or other punishment

Statute held valid and within power of legislature to enact.

The purpose of the statute is to enable "the commissioner to prove his case against defaulting commission merchants without the undue hardship and burden of taking the deposition of each foreign claimant or bringing them into court upon the trial, an impractical and costly undertaking."

Sufficiency of certificate

That the commissioner's certificate fails to state that claimant is a consignor creditor does not invalidate the certificate as presumptive evidence of the facts stated.

N.Y.—Baldwin v. Standard Accident Ins. Co. (Olivit Action), 261 N.Y.S.

507, 237 App.Div. 334, affirmed 188 N.E. 71, 262 N.Y. 575.

40. Verified claim as part of certificate

The consignor's verified claim, when made a part of the commissioner's certificate, loses its identity as an affidavit, and becomes an integral part of the certificate, and as such may be received in evidence.

42. N.Y.—Baldwin v. Standard Accident Ins. Co. (Olivit Action), supra.

43. Bond held within statute authorizing taxation

Commission merchant's bond, required by Comp.St.1922 § 7472, is fidelity insurance as classified by § 7814 subd. 4, and is within § 7811 providing for taxation of attorney's fees as costs in law cases on policies of fidelity insurance.

therefor.⁴⁵ Thus, under statutes so providing, a factor or commission merchant is guilty of a criminal offense where he engages in business without having secured a license as required by statute,⁴⁶ where he purchases goods received by him for sale on commission without prior written authority from the consignor;⁴⁷ where, with intent to defraud, he fails to account for goods received;⁴⁸ where he embezzles the proceeds of a sale;⁴⁹ or where he fails to render a true statement of a sale,⁵⁰ irrespective of his intent in failing so to do.⁵¹

A statute which declares a commission merchant who fails on demand to deliver to the consignor the proceeds of a sale of goods guilty of a misdemeanor makes an actual demand for the proceeds a necessary prerequisite to a conviction,⁵² and a conviction a necessary prerequisite to a recovery of the prescribed penalty.⁵³

Statutory regulations which impose a penalty for a failure to comply with the regulations are subject to the usual rule of strict construction,^{53.5} and a recovery or conviction thereunder can be had only when the case is brought strictly within their provisions.⁵⁴

Prosecution. Rules governing criminal prosecutions in general ordinarily apply in prosecutions for the violations of statutes governing the conduct of business by factors or commission merchants,⁵⁵ such as with regard to the admissibility,⁵⁶ and the weight and sufficiency⁵⁷ of evidence.

§ 5. Creation and Termination of Relation

The relation of principal and factor is usually created by a contract entered into between the parties, to which the usual rules governing the construction of contracts apply.

The relation of principal and factor is usually created by a contract entered into between the parties.⁵⁸ Such a contract, to be valid, need not fix any definite or ascertainable amount of goods to be consigned to the factor for sale,⁵⁹ and in its construction the usual rules governing the construction of contracts in general apply.⁶⁰

§ 6. — Appointment or Employment

To constitute one the factor of another there must be an appointment by the principal and an acceptance thereof by the factor.

To constitute one the factor of another there must be an appointment by the principal and an acceptance of the appointment by the factor,⁶¹ which appointment and acceptance may be made by parol,⁶² or may be implied.⁶³ If a factor accepts a consignment, he must accept and comply with the conditions imposed by the consignor.⁶⁴

Estoppel. A factor may be held liable as such to the owner of goods, although he obtains possession of the goods wrongfully;⁶⁵ but the mere fact that a factor has possession of goods does not preclude the owner from showing, as against a purchaser, that they were not intrusted to the factor for sale.⁶⁶

§ 7. — Duration and Termination

- a. In general
- b. Termination by operation of law

a. In General

In the absence of an express or implied agreement to the contrary, a factor's agency, as a general rule, may be terminated at any time by either the principal or the factor, although the principal's right to terminate it is limited where it is one coupled with an interest.

A factor may be employed for a specified length of time.⁶⁷ In the absence of a fixed time for the continuance of the employment, and where there is no "power coupled with an interest," as a general rule his authority may be revoked by the principal at any time,⁶⁸ unless, as will appear, the factor has made advances on the goods consigned, or unless it appears that the parties intended that the factor should have a reasonable period of time in which to sell the goods consigned, in which case his authority may not be revoked by the principal until such period of time has expired.⁶⁹ An agreement, while not specific as to time, may contain a provision which will determine the time of termination,^{69.5} as where it contains a provision that in the event of cancellation the agreement will remain in effect until the manufacturer has been paid for merchandise delivered.^{69.10}

The factor also may, as a general rule, renounce the agency at any time,⁷⁰ and may, by a default in his obligation under the contract, release the principal from continuing his agency;⁷¹ but it has been held that the principal will not be justified in rescinding an entire contract for a small breach thereof.⁷²

employment that either party may terminate the employment by giving a certain number of days' notice to the other.⁷³

Implied revocation. A revocation will not be implied from acts which are not necessarily inconsistent with a continuation of the agency.⁷⁴

Effect of advances. Where the factor makes advances on the goods consigned, with the consent of or by the direction of the principal, an agency coupled with an interest arises, see supra § 1 e. It follows that in such a case the factor's authority is irrevocable to the extent of his lien for advances made and expenses incurred on the goods;⁷⁵ and his authority to sell in such a case is not terminated by an attachment or garnishment of the goods by the principal's creditors.⁷⁶

Abandonment. If a party to a factoring agreement informs his factor that he abandons the contract which is being financed and will proceed no further in performing it, and if the factor then tries to protect the advances he has already made by taking over completion of the contract in the name of such party, the former factor will become the undisclosed principal in any subcontract that may be entered into by the party he formerly financed;^{76.5} but such change in relationship does not occur so long as the party whom the factor was financing retains any interest in the contract and has not abandoned its completion.^{76.10}

When revocation becomes effective. A revocation by the principal becomes effective as to the factor only from the time he has received notice of it,⁷⁷ and as to a third person from the time he has notice thereof.⁷⁸

b. Termination by Operation of Law

A factor's agency may be terminated by operation of law, as by the death of the factor or principal or by the factor's insolvency.

As in the case of other agencies, a factor's agency may be terminated by operation of law,⁷⁹ as by the death of the factor,⁸⁰ in which event his agency does not pass to his executors or administrators,⁸¹ unless it is one coupled with an interest,⁸² or by the death of the principal,⁸³ unless the factor has made advances or incurred expenses on the goods.⁸⁴

The insolvency of the factor also ordinarily terminates his authority;⁸⁵ but it has been held that, while such insolvency is a ground for the revocation of the agency by the principal,⁸⁶ the mere fact that the factor is insolvent in the sense that he is unable to meet his obligations does not terminate his authority if he has made no assignment and no bankruptcy or insolvency proceedings have been instituted by or against him.⁸⁷

II. POWERS OF FACTOR

§ 8. In General

The powers of a factor are governed by the general rules prescribing the powers of an agent, and by his contract with his principal. In the absence of special authority, he can bind his principal, in the disposition of a consignment, only in the ordinary course of business.

The powers of a factor are governed by the general rules which prescribe the powers of an agent,⁸⁸ the extent of his powers depending largely on the contract between him and his principal,⁸⁹ and the instructions given to him by the principal.⁹⁰ His agency with respect to the particular goods or merchandise is general, unless expressly limited by instructions.⁹¹ Like other agents, he possesses such implied and incidental authority as is reasonably necessary and proper for the execution of his undertaking, and as is usually exercised by factors under like circumstances, and is not forbidden.⁹²

In the absence of special authority, a factor cannot, as a general rule, bind his principal in the disposition he makes of a consignment except in the ordinary course of business;⁹³ thus, a sale of the business itself, including stock in hand, good will, and merchandise held on consignment, is not a sale in the ordinary course of business.⁹⁴ Emergencies may arise, however, in which a factor may from the necessities of the case be justified in assuming extraordinary powers, and his acts fairly done under such circumstances bind the principal.⁹⁵

What law governs. The implied powers of a factor are to be determined by the law of the place where the sale or contract of disposition is made.⁹⁶

§ 9. Delegation of Authority

A factor generally cannot, except as to purely ministerial acts, and unless authorized by usage or custom, delegate his authority to another without the principal's knowledge and consent.

As a general rule, a factor cannot, except as to purely ministerial acts,⁹⁷ delegate his authority to another without the principal's knowledge and consent,⁹⁸ unless he is authorized to do so by usage or custom.⁹⁹ This rule can be invoked, however, only when it is sought to bind the principal by the acts of the subagent,¹ and not when the factor assumes the position of principal and the attempt is made to enforce in the factor's name the contract made by the subagent.²

Effect of delegation. If a factor employs a subagent without authority therefor, the subagent does not become the agent of the principal, and there is no privity of contract between them;³ nor is the principal liable to the subagent for an individual indebtedness due to him from the factor.⁴ In such a case, the factor is responsible for the acts of the subagent.⁵ Where, however, the employment of the subagent is authorized, a privity exists between the principal and subagent and the latter is accountable directly to the principal.⁶ Even though no such privity exists, if the subagent promises the principal to pay the proceeds to him, he is liable to such principal, although he has previously promised the factor to account to him.⁷

§ 10. Particular Powers

A factor authorized to make purchases for his principal may make them in his own name. A factor has no authority to use for his own benefit goods consigned to him, and hence, at common law, has no authority to sell or transfer them to pay his own debts, unconnected with his advances and charges on them, so as to give the transferee good title as against the principal, unless the latter allows the factor to indicate to third persons that he owns the goods.

Where the factor's authority includes the making of purchases for his principal, he may make such purchases in his own name,⁸ and he has power to buy on credit, but not to give the note of the principal.⁹

Power to use or transfer goods for own benefit. A factor has no authority to use for his own personal benefit goods consigned to him,¹⁰ and hence, at common law, has no authority to sell or transfer them in payment of his own debts, unconnected with his advances and charges on them, so as to confer on the transferee a good title as against the principal,¹¹ unless the principal allows the factor so to manage the goods as to indicate to third persons that he is the owner thereof.¹² This rule applies even though the state of accounts between him and his principal is in his favor,¹³ and even though the factor has a lien on the goods.¹⁴

This rule also applies to a purchaser without notice from one who has acquired possession of property from a factor in consideration of a pre-existing debt.¹⁵

§ 11. — Sale or Exchange of Goods in General

- a. General rules
- b. Cash or credit

a. General Rules

In the absence of express limitations, a factor has implied power to sell the goods consigned to him and in his possession, and to do everything necessary for the accomplishment of this object, and may sell in his own name; but he has no implied power to exchange such goods for other goods, or to rescind a completed sale.

Since the object and business of a factor is to sell goods consigned to him, he has, in the absence of express limitations, implied power to do so.¹⁶ The power to sell includes by implication such powers as are necessary for the accomplishment of this object¹⁷ and are not inconsistent with the general power to sell.¹⁸

Sale in own name. In the absence of usage or instructions to the contrary, a factor may sell in his own name, as well as in the name of his principal, the goods intrusted to him for sale.¹⁹ A factor has ostensible authority to deal with the property of his principal as his own, in transactions with persons not having notice of the actual ownership.^{19.5}

Necessity of possession. Since, as shown in § 1, supra, possession of the goods or merchandise is one of the elements necessary to constitute one a factor, a factor has power to sell only goods or merchandise which are in his possession.²⁰ However, it is not necessary that the factor have the actual possession of the goods; if he sells them in good faith by assigning the bill of lading therefor, the sale is valid as against the principal.²¹

Power to barter or exchange. Since a factor's power generally is to sell only, in the absence of special authority, he has no power, in the absence of special authority, to barter or exchange his principal's goods and merchandise for other goods or merchandise.²²

Power to rescind sale. A factor who has completed a sale for his principal has, ordinarily, no power to rescind it;²³ but he may rescind a sale which he is unable to complete.²⁴

b. Cash or Credit

According to the weight of authority, in the absence of instructions or usage to the contrary, a factor has implied authority to sell on reasonable credit, or on such credit as is customary in the market where the goods are sold.

The rule supported by the weight of authority is that, in the absence of instructions or usage to the contrary, a factor has implied authority to sell on a reasonable credit,²⁵ or on such credit as is usual and customary in the market in which the goods are sold;²⁶ and authority to sell on credit may be implied from authority to sell to the best advantage.²⁷ According to other decisions, unless a factor is instructed to sell on credit,²⁸ or unless there is a custom of selling on credit,²⁹ he can sell for cash only and has no power to sell on credit;³⁰ and where the usage of the market in which the goods are sold authorizes sales for cash only, he cannot sell on credit unless authorized by his instructions.³¹

Even though it is the custom of the trade to sell on credit,³² a factor who is instructed to sell for cash cannot sell on credit,³³ unless such instructions have generally been disregarded in the course of dealing between him and his principal.³⁴ Where the contracts are ambiguous as to the question of cash or credit sale, their true meaning may be ascertained, not merely by a reading thereof, but also by evidence of usage of the trade and the prior acts of the parties in performance of the contract.^{34.5}

payment to the factor is binding on the principal, although the factor misappropriates the funds.³⁷

However, the power in the factor to collect does not prevent the principal from controlling the collection,³⁸ or the purchaser from paying to the principal in spite of the objection of the factor,³⁹ especially where the principal's contract with the factor provides that payment shall be made to the principal;⁴⁰ and, subject to the right of the factor to be protected to the extent of his lien, the principal may order the buyer to pay to him and not to the factor, and in such a case a subsequent payment to the factor does not relieve the purchaser from liability to the principal.⁴¹

A del credere factor, in the absence of intervention by the principal, may collect from purchasers the amount due;⁴² but it has been held that when the principal appears, the right of the agent to receive payment ceases,⁴³ although this rule has been limited to the extent that the principal cannot deprive the factor of the right to collect and sue on such debts in his own name save by relieving him of liability on the guaranty.⁴⁴

b. Medium of Payment

A factor generally cannot receive in payment anything except lawful money, unless there is special authority or usage of trade otherwise; but if he has power to sell on credit, he may, unless directed otherwise, take in payment a note in his own name.

As a general rule, a factor has no authority to receive in payment anything except lawful money,⁴⁵ unless there is special authority or a usage of trade otherwise;⁴⁶ he cannot take in payment depreciated currency,⁴⁷ or that which is worthless and void.⁴⁸ If the sale is in the name of the factor and the principal is not disclosed, payment made by a surrender of the factor's own check is binding.⁴⁹

Commercial paper. Ordinarily, a factor has no implied authority to accept negotiable paper;⁵⁰ but where a factor has power to sell on credit, he may, if not directed otherwise, take in payment a note in his own name.⁵¹ Even though there is authority to receive payment in notes, the principal is not obliged to accept notes for goods not sold;⁵² nor, where the factor is to account in satisfactory bank notes, is the principal obliged to accept notes of third persons, not shown to be either bank notes or satisfactory.⁵³ Where it is the practice of factors to sell the goods of several principals together, a factor in such a case may take the note of the purchaser for the whole lot.⁵⁴

§ 13. — Extension of Time of Payment

A factor has no implied power to extend the time of payment after a sale.

A factor has no implied power, after a sale of goods on credit, to extend the time of payment.⁵⁵

§ 14. — Pledge of Goods

The general rule, which is subject to qualifications, as in the case of estoppel, is that a factor has no power, without his principal's consent or authorization, to pledge the latter's goods for his own individual debts, so as to pass title or interest to the pledgee as against the principal.

A factor may pledge the goods of his principal to secure money to pay duties or other charges justified by the usage of trade,⁵⁶ and also to raise money to meet drafts drawn on the factor by the principal before the sale of the goods;⁵⁷ and the general course of dealing may be such as to justify the factor in assuming that he holds the goods with authority to pledge them.⁵⁸ However, it is a well settled rule of the common law that without the principal's consent or authorization a factor has no power to pledge his principal's goods for his own individual debts, so as to pass any title to, or interest in, the goods to the pledgee as against the principal;⁵⁹ and this rule applies even though a bill of lading has been issued to the factor for the goods,⁶⁰ or the active member of a firm of factors is also a partner of the consignor.⁶¹

The general rule applies where the pledgee has notice of the pledgor's character as factor or of the principal's interest in the goods,⁶² and except to the extent that it has been modified by the adoption of the factors' acts, which are discussed infra §§ 64-67, the rule also applies even though the pledgee has no notice of the pledgor's character.⁶³ The general rule does not allow the factor to pledge by the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading⁶⁴ or other symbol of the title⁶⁵ any more than by the delivery of the goods themselves.

The general rule has been applied where the factor has a lien for advances or other sums due him;⁶⁶ but according to other authorities a factor may pledge the goods of his principal to the extent of his lien,⁶⁷ although it has been held that the factor must demand from his principal the amount of his charges before he can pledge the goods to that extent.⁶⁸

Estoppel. The principal may, by some act other than the mere delivery of possession of the goods to the factor, estop himself from denying the right of the factor to treat the goods as his own and pledge them.⁶⁹

A promise by a factor that he will write to his principal to get insurance done does not bind the principal to insure.⁷²

§ 16. — Other Powers

With various qualifications, the general rule is that a factor has no power to compromise a claim against his principal, to mortgage the latter's goods for his own debts, to reship goods to another market, or to submit claims to arbitration; but in the absence of restrictions, he may give the usual warranty as to the goods.

A factor has no implied power to compromise a claim for the purchase price of the goods sold,⁷³ or a claim against his principal;⁷⁴ but a consignee on a joint account with the consignor may compromise a claim arising on a sale of the goods consigned, so as to bind the consignor, if the compromise is reasonable and made in good faith.⁷⁵

To mortgage. At common law a factor cannot, without his principal's consent or authorization, mortgage the latter's goods for his own individual debts, so as to pass any title or interest in the goods to the mortgagee as against the principal;⁷⁶ and this rule applies even though the mortgagee has no notice of the mortgagor's character as factor.⁷⁷ The principal may, however, by some act other than the mere delivery of possession of the goods to the factor, estop himself from denying the right of the factor to mortgage them.⁷⁸

To reship. As a general rule, goods consigned to a factor for sale are to be sold in the market to which they are shipped and where the factor transacts his business, and he has no implied authority to reship them to another market for sale there.⁷⁹ A reshipment, however, may be authorized by custom or usage,⁸⁰ or such authority may be implied from the circumstances of the particular case.⁸¹

To submit to arbitration. A factor has no implied power to submit to arbitration claims arising out of sales or purchases made by him on behalf of his principal.⁸²

To warrant. In the absence of restrictions, a factor has power, in making a sale, to give the usual warranty as to the condition and quality of the goods,⁸³ where the sale is one which according to usage is usually attended with a warranty;⁸⁴ but in the absence of usage or instructions to that effect, he has no authority to warrant that the goods will remain sound for an indefinite period of time,⁸⁵ and under conditions endangering their soundness.⁸⁶

§ 17. Ratification or Repudiation

Acts performed by the factor on the principal's behalf or in his name, without proper authority, may be repudiated or ratified by the principal. It is not necessary to ratification that there be positive or direct confirmation of the factor's acts, but the principal must have full knowledge.

The principal cannot ratify an act of the factor which is not done on his behalf or in his name;⁸⁷ but where the factor performs acts on the principal's behalf or in his name, without proper authority therefor, the principal may either repudiate such acts⁸⁸ or he may ratify them, in which case the rights, duties, and liabilities of all persons concerned are as effectively established as if the acts ratified had been fully authorized in the beginning,⁸⁹ except that the ratification cannot operate to the prejudice of intervening rights of third persons.⁹⁰ If the factor disobeys his instructions, or otherwise exceeds his authority, and the principal, with full knowledge of his acts, either expressly or impliedly approves them, the principal, as well as the other parties concerned, becomes bound by, or is entitled to enforce, rights growing out of, such acts.⁹¹

It is not necessary that there be any positive or direct confirmation of the factor's acts,⁹² and in some cases a presumption of ratification may arise from slight circumstances.⁹³ Thus, the principal ratifies the factor's unauthorized acts if he acquiesces therein, as by failing to disapprove them within a reasonable time after notice thereof,⁹⁴ or if, with a knowledge of the facts, he accepts the benefit of advances made by the factor,⁹⁵ or receives and accepts the proceeds or other benefits of the sale,⁹⁶ unless it is understood by both parties at the time of the receipt of the proceeds that the right of action against the factor is not to be affected,⁹⁷ or if he draws the balance of an account rendered by the factor without objecting thereto,⁹⁸ or if he sues to enforce the contract of sale.⁹⁹

Ratification in part. A ratification must be of the whole transaction; the principal cannot ratify a part and repudiate the other part.¹

Knowledge of facts. In order that the subsequent conduct of the principal may constitute a ratification of the factor's unauthorized acts, it is necessary that the principal should have at the time a full knowledge of all the material facts,² and if he ratifies without such knowledge, he may, after acquiring it, repudiate the transaction,³ unless he is estopped to do so, as against a third person who would be prejudiced thereby.⁴ It is not necessary, in this connection, that the factor should disclose facts of a general nature of which he may reasonably presume the principal has knowledge.⁵

III. RIGHTS AND DUTIES AS BETWEEN FACTOR AND PRINCIPAL

§ 18. Duties and Liabilities of Principal in General

It is the principal's duty to comply with the terms and conditions of his contract with the factor.

It is the duty of the principal to comply with the terms and conditions of his contract with the factor,⁶ including the duty, as explained in subsequent sections, of compensating the factor for his services, infra §§ 41, 42, and of reimbursing him for expenses incurred, infra § 43; and for a breach of the contract the principal may be held liable to the factor for the damages caused thereby.⁷ A principal, however, is not liable for a failure to ship goods to the factor, under a contract which is merely for the delivery, from time to time, of such goods as the principal sees fit.⁸

If the principal is dissatisfied with the factor's conduct in handling his goods, he has the right to pay the factor's charges and dispose of the goods himself, but he is not bound to do so.⁹

§ 19. Duties and Liabilities of Factor in General

A factor is bound to comply with the terms and conditions of his contract with his principal.

A factor is bound to comply with the terms and conditions of his contract with his principal,¹⁰ and, as explained in subsequent sections, is bound, in all his dealings for the principal, to act with good faith and loyalty, infra §§ 21, 22, with reasonable care, skill, and diligence, infra § 20, in obedience to the principal's instructions, infra §§ 23, 24, and scrupulously to account to the principal for his acts, in dealing on the principal's behalf.¹¹

It is the duty of a factor, empowered to pay freight and related charges, to resist the exaction of illegal charges by a carrier;¹² but, where under the terms of the contract the factor is to pay freight and storage charges on goods actually sold by him, but he makes no sale and all the goods shipped to him are returned to the principal at his order and request, the factor is not liable for freight and storage charges thereon.¹³

§ 20. Skill and Diligence Required in General

A factor must ordinarily exercise reasonable care, skill, and diligence in his dealings for his principal, and is responsible only for such losses as result from his failure to do so.

A factor does not guarantee that he will not commit error;¹⁴ he is not an insurer,¹⁵ and is not bound to provide against extraordinary risks.¹⁶ However, as the presumption is that the principal relies on his sound discretion,¹⁷ it is his duty to exercise a reasonable degree of care, skill, and diligence in his employment, that is, the same degree of care and diligence which a prudent man would exercise in his own business; and consequently he is responsible to his principal for such losses, and for such only, as are incurred by reason of his failure to exercise such care, skill, and diligence,¹⁸ except where he

Contract construed

Provision that machine shipped on consignment must be purchased and converted to a "sale" under seller's regular sixty day terms was ambiguous, and, on record presented, in seller's action against corporate buyer and its sole stockholder on account annexed and for conversion, judge was not required as a matter of law to rule that provision meant either that consigned merchandise held by buyer for sixty days must be purchased or that, on sale of consigned merchandise, buyer could hold proceeds for sixty days before transmitting same.

Deposit of security

Under contract whereby stomach tablets were furnished on consignment and were to remain property of manufacturer until sold by distributor, who was to pay for them when sold on basis of cost of manufacture plus fifty cents per one hundred tablets, and who made deposit as guaranty fund for payment of merchandise, which deposit could be increased but not to exceed value of tablets on hand or on order and unaccounted for by distributor, manufacturer was not empowered to demand increased deposit sufficient to cover amount of tablets on hand or on order by distributor at a value composed of cost to manufacturer plus profit of fifty cents per one hundred when sold.

Guaranty of accounts

Contract wherein factor guaranteed principal's accounts and agreed to advance eighty-five per cent of "net outstandings," remaining fifteen per cent to be settled monthly, if sufficient goods were shipped to protect factor for goods returned, disputes as to merchandise to be settled at principal's risk and expense, limited factor's liability to goods actually delivered to customers, especially in view of previous course of dealing.

Picking and marketing crop

Where an agreement for the marketing of a crop of oranges provides that the consignee will "pick . . . and market oranges now growing," a failure to pick and market a part of the oranges before they freeze does not constitute a breach of contract entitling the owner to recover damages therefor, since, by the terms of the agreement, the consignee is not required to pick and market all of the crop.

acts without compensation, in which case it has been held he is liable only for gross negligence.¹⁹

If he acts in good faith with due diligence and skill in discharging his duties, he incurs no liability to his principal,²⁰ such as for losses due to errors of judgment,²¹ or for losses from accidental causes which could not be prevented by reasonable skill and diligence on his part.²² If a factor is employed to sell goods in a foreign market he is not liable to the principal for the negligence and delay of the carrier, provided he exercises reasonable skill and ordinary diligence in selecting the carrier and attending to the shipping of the goods.²³

§ 21. Duty to Be Loyal

It is a factor's duty, in all transactions affecting the subject matter of his agency, to act with good faith and loyalty for the protection and advancement of the interests of his principal, and he may not make a secret profit for himself.

It is the duty of a factor, in all transactions affecting the subject matter of his agency, to act with good faith and loyalty for the protection and advancement of the interests of his principal,²⁴ and so sedulously is this principle guarded that all the factor's acts which tend to violate this duty are regarded as frauds on the confidence bestowed on him,²⁵ although it has been held that, if no actual fraud is chargeable against him, his conduct should receive a liberal and favorable construction.²⁶ In accordance with this principle, a factor cannot place himself in any position which is antagonistic to his relation as agent for his principal,²⁷ as by acting in the same transaction for both his principal and the buyer,²⁸ unless it is clearly understood between the parties that he may do so.²⁹

Making profit out of agency. A factor cannot deal with the subject matter of his agency so as to make a profit out of it for himself in excess of his lawful compensation, and if he does so he may be compelled to account to his principal for all the benefits or profits so acquired,³⁰ unless the principal is estopped to question the factor's right to such profits, by reason of his continuing to deal with the factor with knowledge of the transactions out of which the profits were acquired.³¹

§ 22. — Sale by Factor to Himself

A factor cannot purchase for himself the goods which the principal leaves with him for sale, unless the principal, with full knowledge of the facts, consents.

Unless the principal, with full knowledge of the facts, consents to the transaction, a factor cannot purchase for himself the goods or merchandise which the principal leaves with him for sale,³² and this rule applies even though the factor purchases at the price fixed by the principal,³³ or even though he purchases to save himself from loss on advances made on the goods.³⁴ Likewise, a factor cannot sell to a partnership of which he is a member.³⁵

Where a factor sells to himself, the sale is prima facie voidable,³⁶ and the principal may either ratify the sale, and recover from the factor, as purchaser,³⁷ or he may repudiate it and recover the actual value of the goods.³⁸ If a factor, after purchasing the goods himself, resells at an increased price, the principal may require him to account for what he has received on the resale.³⁹

Factors not showing secret profits

The fact that the factor on several occasions made delivery of packages of merchandise, shipped by the principal to certain customers at a specified price, to other customers at a higher price, which he collected, does not show that he made secret profits at the principal's expense, where he made an equal delivery of the same kind of merchandise, which he had contracted to sell to such customers, at the higher price to other buyers who had contracted to buy at the lower price, it being a mere interchange of the packages, and the factor not making profits in excess of his prescribed commission. § 23. Duty to Obey Instructions

- a. General rule
- b. Qualifications

a. General Rule

As a general rule, a factor must faithfully follow the instructions of his principal, and is liable for any loss resulting from his failure to do so, provided the instructions are expressed in clear and unambiguous language.

As stated in Corpus Juris, which has been quoted and cited with approval, it is a well settled general rule that a factor is bound faithfully to follow the directions and instructions of his principal, and that he will be liable to his principal for any loss or injury which may result from his failure to do so.⁴⁰ This rule applies not only to instructions accompanying the consignment,⁴¹ but also to subsequent instructions,⁴² except that, where the consignment is made under an express agreement, the factor is not bound to follow subsequent instructions inconsistent with such agreement.⁴³ The duty to obey instructions extends to instructions regarding the shipment of the goods.⁴⁴

If the principal's instructions are clear, the factor is generally bound to follow them without regard to how unbusinesslike they may be,⁴⁵ and, as a general rule, no usage or custom in a particular market,⁴⁶ and no motive connected with the interest of the principal, however honestly entertained or wisely adopted,⁴⁷ will justify a departure from them; and it has been held that the factor is liable even though his departure from his instructions occurs through a mistake.⁴⁸ If, however, the factor, with proper care and diligence, faithfully and bona fide carries out the instructions of his principal, and a loss results, such loss must fall on the principal.⁴⁹ If the factor's written instructions refer him to a general agent, he may be justified in obeying new orders of such agent, although they are contrary to the first written instructions.⁵⁰

Acts outside scope of employment. The principal cannot, by instructions, require the factor to perform acts not within the usual scope of his agency, unless the factor undertakes by agreement to do so.⁵¹

Gratuitous service. The fact that the factor is acting without compensation will not prevent him from incurring liability for a departure from his instructions.⁵²

Requisites of instructions. It is not necessary that the instructions be couched in imperious or abrupt language;⁵³ but in order that they may be binding on the factor, so as to render him liable for failing to follow them, it is necessary that they be definite and expressed in clear and unambiguous language.⁵⁴ The mere communication of an expectation or hope as to the price to be obtained,⁵⁵

or of a wish as to the manner, mode, or terms of the sale,⁵⁶ is ordinarily insufficient to constitute an instruction which will be binding on the factor, unless the wish is expressed in such a manner or under such circumstances as to indicate an intention on the part of the principal that it shall be followed.⁵⁷

If the agreement or instructions are so ambiguous as to be capable of several constructions, and the factor acts in good faith in following one construction, he is not liable because of his failure to follow the construction which the principal intended.⁵⁸

b. Qualifications

A factor is not liable for failing to carry out his principal's instructions if without any fault on his part he is unable to do so, as by reason of a sudden emergency.

Where the factor uses reasonable diligence to comply with his instructions and without any fault on his part is unable to do so, he is not liable to his principal for a failure to carry out the instructions.⁵⁹ Inability to comply with instructions will not, however, justify a departure therefrom,⁶⁰ except to the extent that such departure is justified by custom or usage.⁶¹

Emergency. So, where by some sudden emergency or intervening necessity, or other unexpected event, it becomes impossible for the factor to comply with the exact terms of his instructions, he is not liable if in good faith he departs therefrom,⁶²

although such departure turns out to the disadvantage of the principal.⁶³

§ 24. — Effect of Advances; Sale for Reimbursement

As a general rule, if a factor has made advances or incurred liabilities on account of goods consigned to him, and the principal, after a reasonable notice and demand, fails to repay the advances or discharge the liabilities, and the factor has reasonable grounds to apprehend a loss, he may sell, in the usual course of trade, as much of the goods as may be necessary to reimburse such advances or meet such liabilities, although he violates the principal's instructions in doing so, unless there is an express agreement which controls or varies the right.

The mere fact that a factor has advanced money on a consignment does not authorize him wholly to disregard the principal's instructions as to a sale.⁶⁴ As a general rule, however, where a factor makes advances or incurs liabilities on account of the goods consigned to him, and the principal, after a reasonable notice and demand, fails to repay the advances or discharge such liabilities,⁶⁵ and the factor has reasonable grounds to apprehend a loss by obeying the instructions, either because of the insolvency of the principal,⁶⁶ or because of the insufficiency in value of the consignment to repay the advances,⁶⁷ he has the right to sell in the usual course of trade as much of the goods as may be necessary to reimburse such advances or meet such liabilities. This is true even though he violates the principal's instructions in doing so,⁶⁸ unless there is an express agreement between him and his principal which controls or varies this right,⁶⁹ and as in other cases an existence of a usage to sell to pay advances will not control an express contract between the parties as to the sale of the goods.⁷⁰

In the absence of a contract to the contrary, a factor who has made advances is not bound to hold the goods, as instructed, where the principal fails, after a reasonable notice, to deposit more margins,⁷¹ and where, in the opinion of the factor, the goods are not sufficient security for the balance due him,⁷² even though the customer is solvent and the factor holds his note.⁷³ A factor, however, who has advanced generally on the goods in his hands cannot, in the absence of special authority, sell a debt existing in open account arising from the sale of a portion of the consignment so as to transfer a good title to the claim, especially where the debt has not yet matured and where the principal is not in default and has not been called on to repay the advances.⁷⁴

Refusal to sell. Unless a sale at the time or on the terms ordered by his principal will prejudice the factor's security,⁷⁵ the fact that a factor has made advances on goods does not justify him in refusing to sell as directed by the principal,⁷⁶ and, if he is instructed to sell immediately, he may be held liable for any loss resulting from his failure to do so.⁷⁷

Consignment with instructions. Where, at the time the consignment is made, instructions are given to the factor as to the time, manner, or price of the sale, which instructions are assented to by the factor, the mere fact that he subsequently makes advances or incurs liabilities on account of the goods gives him no right to sell for his reimbursement, in violation of such instructions,⁷⁸ especially where the principal stands ready and offers to reimburse and discharge such advances and liabilities.⁷⁹ Where, however, the factor gives his principal reasonable notice to repay the advances and such repayment is refused, the factor is entitled to sell for reimbursement, even though the sale is in violation of the principal's instructions;⁸⁰ and within this exception notice to the principal of the amount of advances and a demand for repayment are essential to the right of the factor to sell.⁸¹

Where goods are consigned to be sold at a certain limited price and the principal fails to indemnify the factor after reasonable notice, the factor may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, sell as much of the consignment as is necessary for his protection at the current price, although that price is lower than the price previously fixed by the principal;⁸² and, where the factor and principal reside in different states, the factor's right to make such a sale of goods in his possession is not affected by the fact that he has brought a suit in the forum of the principal's residence for his advances, asking that the goods be sold under order of court.⁸³

Consignment without instructions. As a general rule, where the consignment is made without instructions, and the factor makes advances or incurs liabilities, either before or at the time of receiving the consignment, he is clothed with the right to sell in the exercise of a sound discretion for his reimbursement at such time and in such mode as the usage of trade and general duty require, and the consignor has no power by any subsequent orders to suspend or control this right of sale,⁸⁴ except as to the surplus not necessary to effect the reimbursement,⁸⁵ and especially where the consignor is insolvent, and the consignment constitutes the only fund for indemnity.⁸⁶ In some states, however, this rule is modified to the extent that the factor cannot sell in violation of subsequent instructions not to sell, without first giving reasonable notice to his principal and demanding repayment of the advances.⁸⁷

§ 25. Duty to Inform Principal

A factor must inform his principal of any facts or circumstances, relating to the consignment, which may make it necessary for the principal to take measures to protect his interests.

As stated in Corpus Juris, which has been quoted and cited with approval, it is the duty of the factor to inform the principal of all facts or circumstances, relating to the consignment, which may make it necessary for the principal to take measures for the protection of his interests; and the factor will be liable to his principal for any loss that may result from his failure to discharge such duty,⁸⁸ or from his negligence in transmitting the information.⁸⁹

It is the duty of the factor to notify the principal of any facts, not known to him, which vitally affect the validity and reliability of orders forwarded to the principal,⁹⁰ or of the seizure of the goods under attachment proceedings against the principal,⁹¹ or of the nonpayment of a check or note taken for the purchase price of the goods,⁹² or of his inability to effect insurance, where it is his duty to insure,⁹³ or of his inability to sell the goods as instructed.⁹⁴ However, a mere failure to notify the principal of a certain fact will not render the factor liable where no damages result from such failure;⁹⁵ nor is the factor liable for failing to inform the principal in regard to matters of which the principal has the means of acquiring knowledge.⁹⁶

Depreciation of goods. Where the consignment is without instructions, and the factor has authority to sell in his discretion, he is not required to notify the principal of a depreciation in the value of the goods.⁹⁷

§ 26. Duty as to Care of Goods

It is the factor's duty to care for and protect, with reasonable prudence and diligence, goods consigned to him, and, if he does so, he is not responsible for any loss not due to any fault on his part. He should not substitute, for the principal's goods, other goods of the same kind, or mingle the principal's goods with those of himself or of others.

Although a contract may limit the liability of a factor in this respect,^{97.50} it is generally the factor's duty to care for and protect the goods which have been consigned to him, with a reasonable degree of prudence and diligence,⁹⁸ that is, such care as a reasonably prudent man would take of his own property in a similar situation.⁹⁹ In exercising such care he may incur reasonable expenses for the benefit of the goods,¹ and may employ counsel to defend actions concerning the goods.² If he exercises such prudence and diligence, he is not liable for any loss of, or injury to, the goods while in his possession,³ as where the loss or injury is caused by a vis major,⁴ or act of God.⁵ On the other hand, if the factor fails to exercise reasonable prudence and diligence in caring for the goods, he is liable for any loss or injury that results therefrom.⁶

Unless instructed to the contrary, he may follow the usage or custom of trade in his care of the goods,⁷ provided the usage or custom is a reasonable one,⁸ has the quality of certainty,⁹ and is not inconsistent with the law.¹⁰

Intermingling goods; substitution. The factor cannot substitute for the goods consigned other goods of the same kind,¹¹ even though he is authorized to deal with them as if they were his own;¹² and as a general rule he should keep the goods of his principal unmixed with those of himself or of others,¹³ and, if he intermingles his principal's goods with his own and consigns the aggregate to a third person to be sold, the factor will be not serve to free the consignee of responsibility for standing idly and negligently by and permitting someone else to take the trailer.

regarded as having received the proceeds of sale of his principal's goods and is liable for the full amount.¹⁴ However, he may be authorized by usage or custom in storing the goods in a mass with other goods of the same grade,¹⁵ although he must keep account of the property of the different consignors.¹⁶

After termination of agency, and reasonable notice to the principal to take the goods back, the factor is liable only for gross negligence.¹⁷

Subagent. A subagent appointed by a factor without authority from the principal may receive goods consigned to the factor, as his representative, and place them in a warehouse for the owner, but he has no authority, by virtue of such relation, to store them in his own name either directly or indirectly.¹⁸

§ 27. Duty as to Insurance

It is the factor's duty to insure the goods when such obligation is imposed on him by custom or usage, the principal's instructions, or agreement or course of dealing. Under such obligation, it is his duty to exercise reasonable prudence and diligence to effect reasonable and proper insurance, and, although he may become liable as insurer by reason of his negligence in failing to effect insurance, he cannot, without his principal's consent, take the risk on himself as an insurer.

Although a factor has power to insure his principal's goods, as explained supra § 15, as a general rule, he is under no obligation to do so,¹⁹ unless such obligation is imposed on him by a general usage or custom to that effect,²⁰ by the instructions of the principal,²¹ or by an agreement or course of dealing between him and his principal.²² If the express contract between the parties does not require the factor to insure, such obligation is not imposed on him by a notice on the invoice sent with the goods consigned, to the effect that the goods are to be covered by insurance for the benefit of the consignor.²³

Extent of duty. Where a factor is under an obligation to insure, such obligation does not import that he shall be personally liable as insurer,²⁴ but his obligation is fulfilled by his obtaining reasonable and proper insurance,²⁵ which is generally presumed to mean full insurance,²⁶ unless it is not the custom or practice to effect full insurance.²⁷ The factor is not required to effect the insurance in the name of the principal, or to place the policy in his possession or control.²⁸ If reasonable diligence is used by the factor to insure the goods, he is not liable in case he is unable to effect the insurance;²⁹ and he may be excused from effecting insurance by a letter from his principal stating that he had requested a third person to effect it.³⁰ If a policy effected by him purports to cover goods belonging to him and also goods held on commission, the insurance inures to the benefit of the principal.³¹

The factor becomes liable as insurer if he does not use reasonable prudence and diligence to effect the insurance,³² or fails to inform his principal of his inability to effect it;³³ but it has been held that in such cases he is entitled to credit for premiums which should have been paid.³⁴ A factor is also liable as insurer if he insures in his own name and fails to collect the insurance.³⁵

Right to become insurer. Although a factor who is instructed to insure may become liable as insurer by reason of his negligence in respect of the insurance, he cannot, without the principal's consent, take the risk on himself as an insurer; at least he cannot do so, so as to charge the principal with the premium, and, if he does take on himself the risk of insurance, he becomes bound to indemnify his principal not as an insurer, but on the ground of having failed to comply with his instructions.³⁶

Duty to account for insurance collected. Where the factor insures the goods of his principal and collects the insurance, he is bound to account to the principal therefor, although he was under no obligation to insure,³⁷ and although the goods were not in fact damaged,³⁸ the extent of his liability being the amount of the insurance plus interest thereon from the time payment is demanded of him.³⁹

§ 28. Duty as to Sale

A factor, acting in good faith and with due diligence, may sell in such a manner and on such terms as he may deem proper, in the exercise of a sound discretion, except as he is controlled by his agreement with his principal, or by the latter's instructions.

In the absence of an agreement or instructions as to the time, manner, or terms of sale, a factor is at liberty to sell at such time, in such manner, and on such terms as he may deem proper in the exercise of a sound discretion, and will incur no liability, where he acts in good faith and without negligence, for losses arising from his errors of judgment;⁴⁰ and in such a case the factor is neither bound to write for instructions, nor, having written for them, to wait for a reply.⁴¹ He may conduct the sale in his usual and customary manner,⁴² but he is bound to exercise ordinary diligence as to the manner and terms of the sale, and will be liable in case he is negligent in this respect.⁴³

The principal, however, ordinarily has the right to direct the time, manner, and terms of the sale,⁴⁴ so long as it does not impair the factor's right to reimbursement out of the proceeds for his advances and charges;⁴⁵ and it is the factor's duty to exercise reasonable diligence to sell as directed.⁴⁶ He cannot dispose of property consigned to him, contrary to the terms of his agreement with the principal, to a third person who is not a bona fide purchaser for value.⁴⁷

Condition of goods. In the absence of instructions or a different custom of trade, the factor should, as a general rule, sell the goods in the condition in which they are consigned to him for sale.⁴⁸

Compliance with revenue laws. In effecting a sale, a factor should comply with the revenue laws of the place of sale, and on his failure to do so he will, as a rule, be liable to his principal for the resulting damages.⁴⁹

Mistake in principal's name, not excusing failure to sell

A factor's failure to sell pursuant to a telegram instructing the sale of cotton of "W. S. Allen" is negligence, although the shipper's name is "W. F. Allen," where, under the facts, in the exercise of ordinary care the factor should not have been misled by the error; and, where a bank acting as the shipper's agent instructed such sale, the shipper's failure to inform the factor of the error after reading the factor's letter acknowledging the receipt of instructions to sell the cotton of "W. S. Allen" is not contributory negligence, since it was reasonable for the shipper to suppose that the use of the wrong initial was a clerical error on the part of the factor.

usually should sell within a reasonable time, at the place of his business or agency; but where the time or place of sale is fixed by agreement or instructions, he should exercise reasonable diligence to sell within the time fixed or at the place authorized.

In the absence of specific instructions, the time of sale is a matter within the sound discretion of the factor,⁵⁰ or is governed by the usual custom of the trade,⁵¹ especially where he has made advances on the goods, as discussed supra § 24. He must, however, sell the goods within a reasonable time, and will be held liable for damages resulting from an unnecessary delay in their sale;⁵² and, on the other hand, if he exercises his discretion fairly and in good faith, and sells the goods within a reasonable time after he receives them, he discharges his duty, and is not liable to the principal for damages sustained,⁵³ by reason of a decline in price,⁵⁴ or because he could have received an advanced price if he had held the goods.⁵⁵

Where the factor's authority is to sell only to protect his lien, and he is not directed by the principal to sell, he is not liable for a delay in the sale.⁵⁶ Where goods are delivered to the factor for sale under a contract of bailment, without specifying a time for performance, the principal cannot contend that an unreasonable time for sale has elapsed, where the goods are held in storage with his complete acquiescence.⁵⁷

pressly contracts or receives instructions as to the time of sale, he must exercise reasonable diligence to comply therewith, and is liable for loss or injury sustained through his failure to do so,⁵⁸ except where he has made advances on the goods, and it becomes necessary to sell in order to protect himself against loss,⁵⁹ although if a sale can be made at a price which will more than pay his charges, he is bound to sell at his principal's request.⁶⁰ However, he is not responsible where he uses all reasonable diligence to effect a sale at the time ordered.⁶¹

When so instructed, it is the duty of the factor to use all reasonable diligence to sell immediately on arrival,⁶² or to sell immediately.⁶³ Where he contracts or is instructed to hold the goods until instructed to sell, he is liable if he sells in the absence of instructions,⁶⁴ although, in case of doubt, it will be presumed that the goods were to be sold during the current season, especially where the principal was largely indebted to the factor.⁶⁵ On the other hand, if the factor advises the sale of goods, and informs the principal of the weak condition of the market, he does not, by holding the goods in accordance with the directions of the principal, become liable for failure to use diligence merely because he afterward sells on a low market.⁶⁶

Until price agreeable to owner

Where a factor was bound under a contract to hold a consignment of wool which had been placed in his hands for sale until the price was agreeable to seller, it was not unreasonable for seller to insist on a further holding of the wool at the time that broker informed him that the same would be sold, when condition justified a belief that a rise in value of wool products might reasonably be anticipated.

Place of sale. In the absence of special instructions or a usage to the contrary, it is presumed that the goods are to be sold at the place to which they are shipped and where the factor has his place of business or maintains an agency, and it is his duty to sell them at that place or market;⁶⁷ and, since the principal selects the market, he assumes the risk of the factor's being unable, by the exercise of ordinary care, skill, and diligence, to make a sale there.⁶⁸ If the factor, in such a case, or otherwise in violation of his agreement as to place of sale,⁶⁹ reships the goods, he will be liable for the loss incurred from selling at a lower price than he could have obtained in the market where he had authority to sell,⁷⁰ and unless the principal is advised that a better price can be obtained at another market to which the goods are shipped, his failure to object to such shipment will not bar his right to recover damages for a failure to sell at the market where the factor has his agency.⁷¹

If the factor is authorized to direct the destination of the goods with a view to the best market, he must exercise reasonable skill and diligence and make all necessary inquiries to take advantage of the best available market.⁷² Where, however, the factor has made advancements to his principal on the goods consigned to him, and the disposal thereof becomes necessary to protect himself against loss, he may exercise his discretion as to the place of sale, even though contrary to positive instructions.⁷³

In the absence of specific instructions as to price, it is the factor's duty to exercise reasonable skill and diligence to sell at the highest price available in the market; but if he agrees, or is instructed, to sell at a specified price, it is generally his duty to sell at that price, unless it would affect his lien for advances, commissions, and charges, or there is an emergency.

Where the goods are consigned without any instructions as to price, it is the factor's duty to use reasonable skill and diligence to sell at the highest price obtainable in the market;⁷⁴ it is his duty to sell for at least the current market price, and if, in violation of this duty, he sells below such price, he is liable to his principal for the difference.⁷⁵ The market, within the meaning of this rule, means such market as is available to the factor,⁷⁶ and not the market of another city.⁷⁷

He is not bound to anticipate an extraordinary rise in the price of the article which may subsequently occur,⁷⁸ and if he exercises ordinary care and diligence in making the sale he is not responsible to his principal for any loss,⁷⁹ although he sells for less than the market value,⁸⁰ or fails to secure more than the current market price;⁸¹ nor is he liable, in the absence of fraud or bad faith, for a loss which occurred by his having held the goods in the hope of a better price,⁸² as where through a mistake of judgment he holds for a rise and the market weakens.⁸³ In the absence of custom or usage justifying it, a factor cannot dispose of his principal's goods, commingled with the goods of others, at an average price.⁸⁴

Where price is fixed. Where the factor enters into an agreement or guaranty as to the price to be received, he is liable if he sells below that price, although the price received is the market price,⁸⁵

Price satisfactory to principal
Or.—Winchell v. Pacific Fruit & and although the contract price is arrived at through a mistake on the part of the factor.⁸⁶

If the factor procures the principal's goods on the representation that he can sell them for a specified price, it is his duty to sell when such price can be obtained, and he assumes the risk of loss in holding them for a better price.⁸⁷ So, where the factor's instructions limit the price at which the goods are to be sold, he is liable to the principal in damages if he sells for less than the price limited,⁸⁸ especially where he has made no advances,⁸⁹ unless, by the exercise of proper skill and diligence, he is unable to sell at that price.⁹⁰ As a general rule, however, a factor is not obliged to sell at a price which would be less than his lien for advances, commission, and just charges, at the direction of his principal,⁹¹ unless the principal pays or tenders such advances and charges.⁹²

The mere fact that the invoice of the goods is accompanied by a statement of the price does not establish such price as the minimum at which the goods are to be sold;⁹³ and an agreement or instruction to sell for the best price obtainable merely requires that he shall sell at the price which he is able to receive by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence.⁹⁴

(2) Where a commodity was delivered to a factor under an alleged agreement that it was to be shipped under the guaranty that it could and would be sold for a sum equaling the advance then made as a consideration for the shipment, the seller could not hold the factor on such guaranty unless the factor had authority to sell in good faith at the best price obtainable.

Emergency. Where the goods are of a perishable nature, the factor may sell below the price limited in order to prevent a total loss, if there is no opportunity to consult the principal.⁹⁵

Failure to sell. Where the principal notifies the factor not to sell unless the price will net him a specified amount, he thereby restricts the power of the factor to sell, and cannot complain of his failure to sell at a lower price.⁹⁶

§ 31. — Sale for Cash or on Credit

- a. In general
- b. Ascertaining responsibility of purchaser
- c. Disclosing name of purchaser

a. In General

When so instructed, it is generally the factor's duty to sell for cash, on delivery of the goods. If he is authorized to sell on credit, he must exercise reasonable care and diligence in doing so, including the taking of security, and is not liable for any loss, with regard to payment, which occurs without his fault, unless he is made liable by his contract.

If a factor is instructed to sell for cash, he is bound to do so, and a violation of such instruction will render him personally liable for the payment of the price for which the goods are sold.⁹⁷ A cash sale, within the meaning of such an instruction, requires the payment of the price on delivery of the goods,⁹⁸ notwithstanding it involves some inconvenience,⁹⁹ and the factor is liable to the principal if he allows the purchaser to take possession of the goods without paying,¹ although it has been held that, where it is the custom to deliver the property and wait a few days for the payment of the money, such sale may be regarded as a cash sale,² provided such custom is so certain, uniform, and notorious that it will be presumed to have been understood by the parties.³

Where the factor is authorized to sell on credit, as discussed supra § 11, it is his duty to exercise reasonable care and diligence in doing so, and if he does so he is not liable for losses with regard to payment of the purchase price which occur without any fault on his part,⁴ unless by express contract he renders himself liable for the payment of the purchase price,⁵ as where he sells on a del credere commission, as discussed infra § 38.

Taking security. It is the duty of the factor to take security from the purchaser to secure the payment of the purchase price, where he is so instructed,⁶ or where it is the usage or custom to take security;⁷ and he will be liable for any loss which may occur through his failure to do so.⁸

A factor must exercise reasonable care and diligence to ascertain the financial standing of a purchaser to whom he sells on credit, and to keep the principal advised as to the pecuniary ability of the purchaser.

A factor is not, in the absence of an express agreement, a guarantor of the responsibility of a purchaser to whom he sells,⁹ and is not liable for the entire amount that could have been realized had a sale, which failed through his negligence in this respect, been completed;¹⁰ but it is his duty to use reasonable diligence and care to ascertain, from the usual and available sources of information, the financial standing of a purchaser to whom he sells the goods on credit, and if, through carelessness or a want of proper examination and inquiry, he gives credit to a purchaser who is insolvent or of doubtful financial standing, he will be liable to his principal for any loss resulting from the insolvency of the purchaser.¹¹

It is also his duty to keep the principal advised as to the pecuniary ability of the purchaser whenever the interests of the principal will be advanced by such knowledge.¹² If, however, he sells in conformity with the usage of trade and uses due diligence to ascertain the solvency of the purchaser, he is not responsible if the purchaser subsequently becomes insolvent.¹³ To charge the factor with negligence in this respect, it is not necessary that he absolutely know that the purchaser is discredited, but it is sufficient if he has notice of facts which ought to put a person of ordinary prudence on his guard.¹⁴

It has been held that even though the factor is instructed to accept the offer of a certain person, this does not authorize him to sell on credit if he knows that such person is irresponsible,¹⁵ and that he will not be responsible for a loss due to the depreciation in value of the goods before another sale can be effected, if he fails to sell to such person;¹⁶ nor will he be liable for a loss due to a fall in the market if the principal, after learning that the sale cannot be carried out on account of the irresponsibility of the purchaser, fails to take steps to protect himself.¹⁷

A factor is not bound to disclose the name of a purchaser to whom he sells on credit, unless such information is necessary to enable the principal to act with reference to the sale.

There is no hard and fast rule that the principal shall be notified of the name of the purchaser, where goods are sold on credit,¹⁸ and the mere failure of the factor to disclose the name of the purchaser will not render him liable for the payment of the purchase price.¹⁹ If, however, such information is necessary, or becomes necessary, in order to enable the principal to act with reference to the sale, the duty at once arises, and becomes obligatory on the factor,²⁰ and it has been held that in such a case a custom or usage among factors not to include the name of the purchaser in the statement of sale made to the principal does not relieve him of that duty.²¹

§ 32. — Collection of Price

A factor should exercise proper care and diligence in collecting the purchase price of goods sold on credit.

Where goods have been sold by the factor on credit, it becomes, as a general rule, his duty to use proper diligence and care in the collection of the purchase price, and where he fails to do so he will become liable to his principal for damages resulting to the latter from such neglect;²² and it is not incumbent on the principal to give special instructions as to the course to be pursued in making the collection.²³ The factor should not, however, put the principal to the expense of a suit to recover the debt unless he has reasonable grounds for believing that the action will result in benefit to the principal;²⁴ but he is personally liable for the resulting loss if he fails to sue in a case where due diligence requires this course of action,²⁵ or if he extends the time of payment without the principal's consent.²⁶

If the factor exercises due prudence both in making the sale and in attempting to collect the money due for the goods, he is not responsible to his principal until the money is actually received.²⁷

§ 33. — Assumption of Debt by Factor

A factor is personally liable for the purchase price of goods sold on credit where his dealings with the purchaser or the principal, such as his taking or negotiating a note given for the purchase price in his own name or for his own use, clearly show an intention to assume the purchaser's debt.

Although the factor is not, as a general rule, liable for the price of goods sold on credit, he may become so, where his dealings with the purchaser or principal clearly show an intention to assume the purchaser's debt,²⁸ as where he treats the original debt as his own,²⁹ or deprives the principal of his means of pursuing the purchaser,³⁰ but not where his acts amount merely to an improvement of the security.³¹

Closing accounts. Where the factor, for the purpose of closing his accounts with the principal, to whom he has made advances, pays the balance due from him, retaining notes taken for goods sold on credit, he thereby assumes such outstanding debts, and the principal is not bound to reimburse him in case such debts are not paid.³² However, the fact that he gives his principal a note for the balance due on an outstanding debt for goods sold on credit, which note is payable after the debt will fall due, is merely a liquidation of the account, and not an assumption of the purchaser's debt.³³

Taking note in own name. The fact that the factor takes a note for the purchase price of the goods in his own name does not render him personally liable for the debt,³⁴ unless it is taken under circumstances which show an intention on his part to make the debt his own,³⁵ or unless the sale on credit was unauthorized.³⁶ It has been held, however, that the taking of a note payable to himself and for an amount to cover the debt due the principal and a debt due himself operates as an appropriation of the debt by the factor, and renders him liable therefor to his principal,³⁷ unless such action is authorized by usage.³⁸

Where the factor sells the goods of several principals to the same purchaser, the fact that he takes one note payable to himself for the purchase price of the whole lot does not render him personally liable to each principal for the purchase price of the goods,³⁹ especially where his act in doing so is in accordance with a general usage of trade.⁴⁰

Negotiating note. The factor will be personally liable to his principal for the payment of the goods where he uses or negotiates for his own use a note taken for the purchase price;⁴¹ but this rule does not apply where the factor negotiates the note for the use of the principal.⁴²

§ 34. Rights and Duties as to Proceeds

- a. In general
- b. Care of proceeds
- c. Remitting proceeds
- d. Liability for interest

a. In General

In the absence of an agreement to other effect, and subject to the factor's lien for advances and charges, the proceeds of a sale by a factor belong to the principal, and it is the factor's duty to account to his principal for such proceeds, and to apply or dispose of them in the manner agreed on or instructed.

Unless there is an agreement, express or implied, giving the factor the right to appropriate the proceeds of a sale to his own use,⁴³ and subject to the lien of the factor for commissions, advances, and charges, as discussed infra § 45, the proceeds of goods sold by a factor belong to the principal, and the factor holds them in a fiduciary or trust capacity, although they are deposited to his credit in a bank⁴⁴ and although he has prosecuted a claim for the proceeds to judgment, for the use of the

"The trust fund doctrine in the commission merchant cases is predicated upon the trust relationship existing by virtue of the stock be-

principal.⁴⁵ This right or title of the principal also extends to unpaid purchase money,⁴⁶ and to securities taken by the factor in payment of goods sold, although taken in his own name.⁴⁷

Accordingly, as a general rule, the factor is liable, and bound to account to the principal, for the proceeds of a sale,⁴⁸ although the sale, as between the principal and the purchaser, is illegal,⁴⁹ or the principal obtained the goods under an illegal contract,⁵⁰ and although the factor has guaranteed the account.⁵¹ This general rule applies although the sale by the factor was unauthorized⁵² or was in violation of the law,⁵³ nor can he escape liability to the principal by setting up outstanding equities between the principal and a third person in which he has no concern,⁵⁴ unless the principal is not the owner and the true owner appears and establishes his right to the proceeds.⁵⁵

A factor cannot apply the profits of one of his customers in offsetting the losses of the others.⁵⁶

Disposition of proceeds. If the factor has agreed, or is instructed, to apply or dispose of the proceeds in a particular manner, it is his duty so to apply or dispose of them,⁵⁷ as where a draft is drawn in favor of a third person on proceeds of a specific consignment, of which draft the factor has notice,⁵⁸ and, if he promises or is directed to appropriate them to the payment of a debt due from the principal to a third person, he is bound to apply them to that purpose and not to a debt due to himself,⁵⁹ or to any other purpose,⁶⁰ except as to proceeds which are not needed for the purpose specified.⁶¹

If the consignment is made without instructions, the factor may apply the proceeds to the payment of a debt due him from his principal.⁶² If the factor makes an unauthorized disposition of the proceeds, he is liable to his principal therefor,⁶³ as where he pays them to a third person without authority from his principal,⁶⁴ unless they are so paid through a mistake due to the fault of the principal.⁶⁵

An agreement to deliver the money or evidences of debts on demand is not affected by a further agreement to guarantee the debts if not paid within ing delivered to a commission merchant, for sale only, and where the title to the stock does not pass to the commission merchant but remains in the party who delivers the stock to the commission merchant to make sale, for him."

ceeds from shipments to be deposited in a named bank is not invalid, under Packers and Stockyards Act 1921 § 407, 7 U.S.C.A. § 228, as a discrimination between shippers, where the bank named is in the same town as the bank wherein other shippers' funds are deposited.

b. Care of Proceeds

A factor must exercise ordinary prudence and diligence in caring for the proceeds in his possession, and should not commingle them with his funds or those of another, unless there is a custom of commingling, to which the principal consents.

While the proceeds remain in his possession, the factor must exercise ordinary prudence and diligence in caring for them,⁶⁷ and will be liable for the loss thereof if it occurs through his negligence.⁶⁸ However, in the absence of a special agreement to that effect he is not an insurer of the safety of the proceeds,⁶⁹ and will not be liable if they are lost or stolen without any negligence on his part.⁷⁰

Commingling proceeds. A factor should keep his principal's funds unmixed with his own or with the funds of others,⁷¹ unless there is a custom, to which the principal consents, of commingling the funds in a common mass.⁷² If the factor mixes the principal's funds with his own or others, or uses them indiscriminately with his own funds, the principal may either seek satisfaction out of the whole mass with which his own funds have become undistinguishably commingled⁷³ or he may treat his factor as a debtor for the amount thus used or commingled.⁷⁴

Where a factor deposits the principal's funds in a bank in his own name without notice to the principal, and without indicating that they are the principal's funds, he is liable for a loss due to the insolvency of the bank,⁷⁵ or to the depreciation of the currency deposited;⁷⁶ but if he notifies his principal that the funds are so deposited and are subject to his order at any time, he is not so liable.⁷⁷

c. Remitting Proceeds

A factor generally holds the proceeds of sale subject to the principal's instructions, and need not remit them, unless he is required to do so by agreement, previous course of dealing, or usage of trade. A remittance, when required, should be in the mode authorized or instructed, or in accordance with the usual course of business.

In the absence of a special agreement, instructions, or usage to other effect, it is not the duty of the factor to make remittances of money to his principal, but it is his duty, after notifying him of the sale, to hold the money subject to his instructions;⁷⁸ and if, without authority or instructions therefor, he remits the proceeds in a particular manner, the remittance is at his risk.⁷⁹ Where, however, either by agreement or previous course of dealing, or by usage of trade, the factor is bound to forward the money to his principal, it is his duty to do so as he receives it at the earliest opportunity without waiting for a demand,⁸⁰ although it is only a portion of what he expects from the sale;⁸¹ and no usage to the contrary will either justify or excuse his retaining it beyond such time,⁸² unless the sum is so small as not to justify the expense of forwarding it.⁸³

A factor cannot justify a refusal to pay over the proceeds on the ground that they have been seized by virtue of an attachment against a third person, or that they have been paid over in pursuance of an order in proceedings supplementary to execution in an action against such third person, of which the principal had no notice, where either the seizure

under attachment or the payment under the order was without authority of law.⁸⁴ A factor who deposits the proceeds in a bank other than the one in which he was directed to deposit them is liable for the loss resulting from the failure of the former bank.⁸⁵ If a factor fails to remit the proceeds in his hands from the sale of a portion of goods sold according to the terms of his contract, he cannot hold his principal liable for failure to consign the balance, although the factor was obliged to buy at an advanced price to fulfill the contract of the purchaser, and although he should be considered as the principal's agent in making the contract of sale.⁸⁶

A statute declaring a factor guilty of fraud if he fails to pay over proceeds belonging to the principal does not apply to a violation of an express direction of the principal, or where there is no showing of a failure to account for or pay over the proceeds.⁸⁷ A statute which requires a commission merchant to remit to the producer within ten days after a sale is not void, because many sales must be made on credit, and the effect of the statute will be to require a merchant to remit before he has collected, since the statute may simply have the effect of requiring the sale to be made for cash.⁸⁸

Mode of remittance. If the factor is especially instructed as to the mode of remittance, he must follow such instruction⁸⁹ and exercise reasonable care and diligence in doing so.⁹⁰ Where, however, he has general authority to remit, without any instructions as to the mode thereof, he is bound only to exercise reasonable diligence and skill as to the mode and in making a remittance,⁹¹ and he will not be liable if he acts with such skill and diligence in accordance with the usual course of business in such cases.⁹²

By bill of exchange. If a factor is authorized to remit by bill of exchange or draft, and he exercises reasonable skill and diligence in purchasing and remitting a bill on a person in good credit, he is not responsible if it is protested or dishonored;⁹³ and, although he need not inquire into the credit of the drawee unless there are circumstances of suspicion sufficient to put a man of ordinary care on his guard,⁹⁴ he may be held responsible if he is chargeable with negligence, as to the standing of the drawee with regard to which he is put on inquiry.⁹⁵ He may be held responsible for a bill drawn by a bank in which he has deposited the proceeds to his own credit,⁹⁶ or if, instead of purchasing a bill, he remits one belonging to himself, and it is not paid.⁹⁷

Liability on indorsements. If the factor is instructed to remit by bill of exchange he is not obliged to indorse or guarantee the bills remitted unless the principal can show that custom or usage requires an indorsement or guaranty.⁹⁸ If he does indorse, he may prove that his indorsement with the knowledge and assent of his principal was made without intent to assume liability, but was for the sole purpose of facilitating collection;⁹⁹ and he is not liable on his indorsement if he receives no consideration for guaranteeing paper transmitted and does not undertake to do so by express contract.¹

d. Liability for Interest

A factor is not liable for interest unless he is in default or interest is provided for by his contract.

In the absence of any contract or usage to that effect, a factor is not liable for interest unless he is in some default,² especially where the principal has been guilty of laches and unfairness;³ and as a general rule, if the factor is ready at the proper time to account for and turn over the proceeds, he is not liable for interest until after a demand is made on him by the principal for the proceeds of sales made.⁴

Where, however, he fails or refuses to account on demand, or when it is otherwise his duty to do so, he is liable for interest from the time when he should have accounted and turned over the proceeds,⁵ particularly where his contract with the principal so provides;⁶ and where the contract provides for interest, and also for a carrying charge, such interest and charge on an unpaid balance do not cease on the factor's death.⁷ If he makes a tortious sale and is sued for the proceeds in assumpsit, he is liable for interest from the time of receiving the proceeds of the sale.⁸

§ 35. Duty to Accept or Meet Draft

A factor is under no obligation to accept or pay a draft drawn on him by his principal, unless he has, for a valuable consideration, agreed to do so, or unless such obligation is imposed on him by usage.

A factor is under no obligation to accept or pay a draft drawn on him by his principal,⁹ unless he has, for a valuable consideration, either expressly or impliedly agreed to do so,¹⁰ or unless such obligation is imposed on him by a usage of trade.¹¹ This rule applies even though the factor has in his hands, at the time, funds of the principal sufficient to meet the draft when presented.¹²

If a factor expressly agrees to accept bills drawn on him, he is bound to do so, and it is immaterial that he has no funds in his hands, unless this is made a condition of the agreement to accept.¹³ If the factor has notice that the principal has drawn on him in anticipation of the avails of the consignment, he becomes bound, by accepting the consignment, to pay the bill or draft, and in case of non-payment is liable to his principal for the resulting damages;¹⁴ but where the factor has made advances on the goods consigned he is not bound to accept and pay a draft drawn on him by the principal, in favor of a third person, until such advances are repaid.¹⁵

In accepting and paying drafts, it is the factor's duty to exercise reasonable care and diligence to determine whether the drafts drawn on him are those of his principal, and if he has the means within his possession of determining the genuineness of the signatures, and he receives and discounts forged drafts, he must bear the loss.¹⁶

§ 36. Duty to Make Advances

A factor's duty to advance money due for freight on property consigned depends solely on the agreement or course of dealings between him and his principal.

There is no unvarying rule of law which makes it the duty of the factor to advance from his own pocket moneys due for freight on property consigned to him by his principals, and his duty to do so depends solely on the agreement or course of dealings between him and his principal.¹⁷

§ 37. Duty to Keep and Render Accounts

It is ordinarily the factor's duty to keep regular and accurate accounts of all transactions with regard to the goods consigned, and to give the principal an opportunity to inspect them; and, where the accounts are settled or stated, they are generally conclusive between the principal and the factor.

Since, as shown supra § 34, it is the duty of a factor to account for the proceeds of the goods consigned to him for sale, it is ordinarily his duty to keep true, regular, and accurate accounts of all his transactions and dealings with regard to such goods,¹⁸ and to give the principal an opportunity to

Sufficiency of information

(1) A person who intrusts property to another for sale is entitled to such information concerning proceeds of sale and expenses charged as will enable a person of ordinary intelligence to understand the transaction.

Cal.—Reinert v. California Almond Growers Exchange, 70 P.2d 190, 9 C.2d 181.

(2) Agreement, which provided that defendants should render monthly statements to plaintiff showing the status of its account, did not re-inspect them,¹⁹ and also to give him a correct copy of the entries in the books, including all memoranda connected therewith;²⁰ and if the factor, without any excuse, destroys his books, before an examination thereof is finished,²¹ or refuses to enter an account of sales,²² such fact raises an unfavorable presumption against him with respect to the amount and value of the goods sold and unaccounted for. Although the contract between the parties provides for a settlement of accounts only by the written approval of the principal, they may subsequently modify the contract and make a valid settlement without approval in writing.²³

Time of accounting; demand. The factor should be ready to render to his principal a full and complete statement of his dealings and of the state of accounts between them, whenever reasonably requested or demanded,²⁴ or to render such an account within a reasonable time after sale, without a demand,²⁵ especially where a demand is impracticable or highly inconvenient;²⁶ and a refusal or failure to render an account for an unreasonable time may render him liable in damages.²⁷

Place of accounting. The factor may be required to account to the principal at the latter's place of business or residence.²⁸

Effect of account. Accounts current are necessarily provisional until settled, and may be rectified for errors or omissions;²⁹ but where a factor's account current shows that on a certain day there was a balance in his hands due his principal, all previous charges against the principal are extinguished.³⁰ Where the accounts are settled or stated, they are, as a general rule, conclusive between the principal and factor,³¹ except that they may be opened, surcharged, or falsified on the ground of omission, fraud, mistake, or undue advantage.³² Thus, if the factor renders his account in good faith and the principal makes no objection to it, the principal's assent to it as correct is presumed;³³ unless he objects within a reasonable time³⁴ or within the time set by the agreement,^{34.5} he will be bound by the accounting rendered.

The account rendered may be conclusive against the factor himself in the matter of his charges for commissions,³⁵ or as to the place of payment of the balance due on the account;³⁶ but if it is challenged by the principal, it is open for correction by the factor.³⁷

§ 38. Duties and Liabilities of Del Credere Factors

The obligation under a del credere commission arises only under an express contract, and where the sale is made on credit. By the weight of authority, the contract of a del credere factor is an absolute engagement to pay debts arising out of sales made by him when they become due.

The obligation under a del credere commission arises only under an express contract and is not implied by law,³⁸ and also arises only where the sale is made on credit.³⁹

"Del credere factor" defined see supra § 1.

Liability for conversion see infra § 39.

25 C.J. p 375 note 39.

Nature of liability. In some jurisdictions a del credere agent is considered merely a guarantor of the debt due from the purchaser of goods sold by him, and, in order to fix liability on him, the principal must have first made an effort to collect from the purchaser;⁴⁰ but the weight of authority is to the effect that the contract of a del credere factor is considered to be an absolute engagement to pay debts arising out of sales made by him when they become due.⁴¹ Under this rule, the liability of a del credere factor accrues when, and only when, the term of credit given on the sales has expired, and the purchase money is due;⁴² and when the debt becomes due, the liability is complete without any demand being made on the principal debtor.⁴³ However, the liability of the factor does not preclude his principal from resorting to the purchaser to obtain payment at any time before the debt is paid.⁴⁴

The extent of the liability of a del credere factor depends, of course, to a large extent on the terms of his contract with the principal;⁴⁵ but it may be laid down as a general rule that a del credere factor is bound to see that his principal is paid in full⁴⁶ for all goods sold by him,⁴⁷ unless for some good reason the sale is rescinded or the goods cannot be delivered.⁴⁸ If the goods consigned are not in accordance with the contract, he is not bound to insist on the buyer's accepting the goods for the purpose of putting his principal in a better position.⁴⁹ A factor who agrees to indorse or guarantee all notes taken from customers is not bound to indorse

a note taken for goods sold by a general agent of his principal against the factor's protest and after his statement that he would not indorse the note.⁵⁰

However useful a del credere agency may be in allocating risks between the parties and determining their rights between themselves, the terms of such an agency do not necessarily control when the rights of others intervene, whether they be creditors or the sovereign.^{50.5}

On remittance. It has been held that a guaranty under a del credere agency extends only to the collection of the proceeds and not to the remittance thereof;⁵¹ and hence, if the factor exercises due care in selecting a drawee in good credit, the guaranty does not extend to a bill of exchange which he remits to his principal in the usual course of business or under an express authority to remit,⁵² unless by agreement of the parties the factor is authorized to charge a commission for the guaranty of bills of exchange remitted, and in such case his omission to charge the commission does not absolve him from his liability as guarantor of the remittance.⁵³ On the other hand, it has been held that the factor is bound not only for the collection of the money, but also for its safe transmission to the principal,⁵⁴ unless the remittance is made under special instructions from the principal, which are observed with proper caution and diligence.⁵⁵

Waiver or release by principal. The principal may waive his rights under the contract.⁵⁶ The

§ 39. Liability for Conversion Generally

A factor is liable for a conversion of his principal's goods, or the proceeds thereof, where he deals with them in subversion of, or inconsistently with, the principal's rights therein.

A factor who, without a legal excuse, refuses to account for and deliver his principal's goods on a proper demand therefor is liable as for a conversion thereof,⁵⁸ as where he refuses to return unsold goods to the principal on demand,⁵⁹ or where, having a lien on the goods for advances and charges, he refuses to return them on a proper tender and demand by the principal.⁶⁰ The factor is also guilty of conversion where he otherwise deals with the goods or proceeds in subversion of, or in a manner inconsistent with, the principal's rights therein,⁶¹ as where he violates the contract or the instructions of the principal as to the sale of the goods,⁶² although not where the contract or instructions are ambiguous and he follows the construction put thereon by the parties themselves;⁶³ and he may be liable even if he does not exercise complete manual control over the goods⁶⁴ or does not appropriate to his own use the proceeds of the sale thereof.⁶⁵

On the other hand, a factor is not liable for conversion where his acts are not in subversion of, or inconsistent with, the principal's ownership,⁶⁶ as where he sells after the revocation of his agency but before notice of such revocation;⁶⁷ nor is he made liable for conversion by a mere failure to account,⁶⁸ or by a mere sale of the goods by the carrier by which he ships them to an agent;⁶⁹ and a mere intention on the part of the factor to appropriate the proceeds of the goods to his own use does not amount to a conversion.⁷⁰

Failure to pay over money. Where the factor is not bound to pay over the identical money received by him as factor, his failure to pay it over to the principal on demand is not a conversion.⁷¹

Conversion through subagent. A factor who disposes of the goods through a third person to whom he has delegated his authority, without the sanction of his principal or the usage of trade, is liable for a conversion,⁷² as is the subagent by reason of his sale of the goods;⁷³ but the principal may affirm the sale through the subagent and hold the factor liable for the value of the goods.⁷⁴

A del credere factor is not liable for conversion of the goods because he fails to collect for them; the principal's remedy is by suit on the guaranty.⁷⁵

Liabilities of del credere factors generally see supra § 38.

Pledge. If the factor wrongfully pledges his principal's goods, as for his own debt, the factor is liable for conversion and the principal may sue him in trover,⁷⁶ without first making a demand on him for redelivery;⁷⁷ but the factor may, in such action, recoup the amount of his charges and advances.⁷⁸ Instead of suing in trover, the principal is entitled, in a settlement of accounts with the factor, to an allowance for any loss or damages which result from the unauthorized pledge;⁷⁹ whether he may maintain an action of indebitatus assumpsit for goods sold and delivered has been said to be in doubt.⁸⁰

§ 40. Rights in and Title to Goods

As a general rule, the right in, or title to, the goods remains in the principal until the goods are transferred to a purchaser; the mere fact that the factor has made advances does not change the title, but the principal's right, title, and power of disposition are subject to the special interest of the factor arising out of his lien.

As a general rule, even though the factor has possession of the goods consigned, and is a del credere factor,⁸¹ the general right in, or title to, the goods remains in the principal until they are transferred to a purchaser,⁸² and, as shown supra § 28, he has the right to direct and control their sale or disposition. Unless there is a special contract with regard to returning the goods,⁸³ the principal may repossess himself of the goods at any time before sale on payment of his indebtedness to the factor,⁸⁴ and the factor may return the goods.^{84.5}

With some exceptions,⁸⁵ as where he has yielded to a paramount title asserted by a third person without his connivance,⁸⁶ the factor is estopped to deny the principal's title;⁸⁷ nor are the goods liable for the factor's debts.⁸⁸ The factor is regarded as a bailee of the property⁸⁹ and as sales agent of the bailor.^{89.5}

the goods does not change the title thereto,⁹⁰ but to the extent that the factor has a lien on the goods, in accordance with the rules stated infra § 45, he has a special property or interest in the goods,⁹¹ and the principal's right, title, and power of disposition of the goods are subject to such lien.⁹² This rule also applies as against a person claiming to have purchased the goods from the principal,⁹³ and although the person to whom the factor has advanced money on the property may have acted fraudulently in obtaining the shipping bills without having paid for the property, yet if the advances were made by the factor in good faith and without any knowledge of the fraud, the shipper will lose his right of reclaiming the property and his title will be divested as against the factor,⁹⁴ who will be considered a bona fide purchaser to the extent of his advances.⁹⁵ Where a factor makes advances to his principal for the purchase of goods, he may stipulate by parol that the title shall be in him as security for the money advanced.⁹⁶

As a general rule the factor, although he has made advances on the goods, acquires no right of property whatever in them until the delivery thereof or of the bill of lading therefor,⁹⁷ although the principal is indebted to the factor for advances on previous consignments, to an amount greater than the value of the goods.⁹⁸ If in pursuance of an agreement goods are shipped to a factor in satisfaction of antecedent advances and are thus set apart and specifically appropriated for this particular purpose, the title to the goods vests in the factor upon the receipt thereof by the carrier,⁹⁹ although the principal retains the bill of lading or takes it in his own name;¹ but it must appear that the delivery to the carrier was made with the intent to transfer the property.²

§ 41. Compensation of Factor

- a. In general
- b. As affected by sufficiency of services
- c. Rate or amount of compensation
- d. Forfeiture or loss of commissions

a. In General

A factor's right to compensation rests on a contract, express or implied, or on a statute; unless his contract provides otherwise, he is entitled to commissions only on sales made by him, and not on those made by the principal or other agents. He is generally entitled to commissions for funds advanced, drafts accepted, or notes indorsed for the principal's benefit.

A factor's right to compensation, which usually takes the form of commissions on the goods sold, as appears supra § 1, rests on a contract, express or implied,³ or on a statute.⁴ Such a contract may be implied from a custom among factors of charging a certain commission,⁵ or from the general course of dealing between the parties,⁶ and where a factor performs services without an express contract therefor, the law may imply a promise on the part of the principal to pay for the services,⁷ even though the person performing them is not engaged in the regular business of a factor.⁸

However, a person who acquires possession of the goods and sells them without the consent of the owner is not entitled to compensation;⁹ nor is a factor entitled to commissions for an unauthorized sale,¹⁰ unless the principal ratifies it.¹¹

Payment. The factor's compensation is generally payable, and estimated, in money, and not in the goods of his principal;¹² and where a factor takes from the purchaser a separate note to himself for the amount of his commission, and discounts it and appropriates the proceeds, his action amounts to a payment of his commissions as between him and his principal.¹³

Transactions for which compensation is payable. As a general rule a factor is entitled to commissions, as such, only on the amount of goods actually sold.¹⁴ He is so entitled only on sales made by him, and not on those made by the principal or other agents,¹⁵ especially after his agency has expired,¹⁶ although he has made advances on the faith of the property,¹⁷ and unless his contract expressly or impliedly provides that he shall be paid commissions on sales made by the principal or the latter's other agents.¹⁸ If a loss occurs because of a sale on credit, the factor will or will not be entitled to commissions on such sales according to the usage of commerce.¹⁹ A factor is not entitled to commission on the payment of his own debt to his principal.²⁰

Commissions for advances and acceptances; disbursements. In addition to commissions for other purposes, a factor is generally entitled to commissions for funds advanced, drafts accepted, or notes to earn a commission,²⁸ and he is entitled to proportionate compensation where he has performed important services, but is prevented, without any fault on his part, from completing them.²⁹

Where complete performance is prevented by the principal's withdrawing the goods, without a substantial reason therefor, a factor who has made advances on the goods may be entitled to the full amount he would have earned by complete performance;³⁰ but if the withdrawal from the factor is made before he takes any steps to execute the power or acquires any interest in the goods or incurs any expense or liability with reference thereto, he is not entitled to commissions.³¹

c. Rate or Amount of Compensation

In the absence of an express agreement or statute fixing the amount of a factor's compensation, he is entitled to the amount usually charged for such services, provided it is just and reasonable, or, in the absence of a customary rate, to a fair and reasonable compensation.

The rate or amount of compensation to which a factor is entitled is generally determined by the contract,³² although it may be governed by statute.³³

Customary or reasonable rate or amount. In the absence of an express agreement fixing the rate or amount of compensation, the factor is entitled to the amount usually charged for such services,³⁴ provided it is just and reasonable.³⁵ If there does not appear to be a customary rate, he is entitled to a fair and reasonable compensation, taking into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the particular case;³⁶ and this may be the rule of compensation even though the rate was fixed by a previous contract, if it is no longer operative.³⁷

In the absence of a special agreement to that effect, a factor is not entitled, as a matter of law, to the same commission on contracts negotiated by him as a broker as he received for his services as factor.³⁸

d. Forfeiture or Loss of Commissions

As a general rule, a factor who is guilty of fraud, misconduct, gross negligence, or breach of contract forfeits his right to commissions, unless the principal waives the tort or breach.

As a general rule, a factor who is guilty of fraud, misconduct, breach of contract, or gross negligence in the conduct of his agency forfeits his right to commissions,³⁹ unless the principal waives the tort or breach of contract.⁴⁰ Thus, he generally forfeits his commission where he violates his contract, or the principal's instructions, with regard to the sale,⁴¹ renders a false account with a fraudulent intent,⁴² fails to keep and render proper accounts,⁴³

Commissions deducted from damages

It has been held that, where the factor sells below the price limited, the principal is entitled to recover the difference between the price received and the price limited, but that the factor is entitled to a deduction for commissions.

appropriates the proceeds of sale to his own use,⁴⁴ or accepts a commission from the buyer without the knowledge and approval of his principal.⁴⁵

A breach of duty in one transaction does not deprive a factor of his right to commissions in another transaction, where his agreement provides for the keeping of a separate account of each transaction;⁴⁶ nor does he lose his right to commissions because of clerical errors or mistakes which do not result in loss or damage to the principal,⁴⁷ and which are honestly made.⁴⁸ A question whether a factor had the authority to delegate authority to a subagent to make a sale does not affect the factor's right to compensation for sales made by the subagent.^{48.5}

Guaranty as to amount of sales. If the factor guarantees to his principal that he will realize a certain amount from the sales, he will not be allowed commission where such allowance would bring the amount received by the principal below the amount guaranteed by the factor.⁴⁹

§ 42. — Del Credere Commissions

A del credere factor is supposed to receive an additional consideration for the risk of guaranteeing the purchaser, when the sale is made on credit; it is earned, with respect to each sale, immediately on the sale's being effected.

One who sells on a del credere commission is supposed to receive an additional consideration for the risk incurred by guaranteeing the purchaser.⁵⁰ This additional consideration or commission is earned when the contract of guaranty is entered into, and that time, with reference to any particular sale, is immediately on the sale's being effected, and not when the account is collected.⁵¹ Such a commission may be demanded only where the factor is bound by his agreement to make the guaranty, and not where he makes it voluntarily,⁵² and also only where the sale is made on credit and not where it is for cash.⁵³

The fact that the factor becomes insolvent before the credit given on the sale has expired does not affect his right to his full commission, for although his insolvency may lessen the value of the guaranty, it does not alter the legal status of the parties.⁵⁴

Where principal fails to carry out contract. Where a del credere factor procures a contract of sale for his principal, and, upon the principal's being unable to furnish the full amount of goods, makes up the deficiency by procuring goods from other customers, and carries out the contract with profit to the principal, he is entitled to commissions on the whole amount of goods contracted for; but if the factor procures a release of the contract which the principal is unable to fulfill, he is entitled only to a proportionate share of his commissions.⁵⁵

§ 43. Reimbursement and Indemnity

- a. In general
- b. Forfeiture or loss of right to reimbursement

a. In General

A factor is entitled to be reimbursed by his principal for all necessary charges, expenses, disbursements, and advancements made or accruing in the course of the agency and for the principal's benefit, provided they are made in good faith and without negligence and are necessary to protect and promote the principal's interest in the subject matter of the agency; and he is entitled to interest on advances made by him or on a balance due him on an account stated.

A factor is entitled to be reimbursed by his principal for all necessary charges, expenses, disbursements, and advancements made or accruing in the course of the agency and for the principal's benefit,⁵⁶ provided such expenditures and advancements are made in good faith and without negligence, and are necessary in order to protect and promote the interest of the principal in the subject matter of the agency.⁵⁷ The right to reimburse-

For advances. Advances by a factor to his principal are generally made, as shown infra § 44, not only on the faith of the goods consigned, but also on the personal credit of the principal, and hence, as a general rule, the principal is personally bound to reimburse the factor for such advances,⁷¹ although the goods are destroyed.⁷² This rule applies to advances made by the factor's payment of the principal's drafts drawn on him⁷³ or indorsed by him,⁷⁴ and to money paid in the principal's behalf,⁷⁵ and also applies to advances outside the contract if the principal procures them and has the benefit thereof.⁷⁶ goods, he cannot recover for such advances without showing that such bills were dishonored and that he has paid them or is liable thereon.⁷⁷

For loss and damage sustained. The principal is bound to indemnify the factor against the consequences of all legal and proper acts done by him in the execution of his agency or in pursuance of the authority conferred on him;⁷⁸ but the factor is not entitled to indemnity for losses incurred through his breach of his contract,⁷⁹ or in an unauthorized transaction,⁸⁰ unless the transaction is ratified by the principal.⁸¹ Where a factor becomes a guarantor to the purchaser, he may recover from his principal only the amount which he pays on the guaranty, and not the amount for which he has become liable, but has not paid.⁸²

Interest. As a general rule, a factor is entitled to interest on advances made by him,⁸³ or on a balance due him on an account stated,⁸⁴ although not on his own charges and commissions;⁸⁵ but it has been held that a del credere factor is not entitled to interest for advances, since he is by his contract bound for the payment of the price of the goods.⁸⁶ If a factor, by breach of the contract of agency, causes loss to the principal, he forfeits his right to interest on his advances.⁸⁷

A factor may, by his negligence, fraud, or misconduct, whereby the principal sustains a loss, forfeit his right to be reimbursed for expenditures or advances.

A factor may, by his negligence, fraud, or misconduct in his agency, whereby the principal sustains a loss, forfeit his right to be reimbursed for expenditures or advances.⁸⁸ However, a sale in violation of his instructions does not entirely defeat his right to recover a balance due for advances;⁸⁹ nor is his right to reimbursement for advances waived by his agreeing to wait longer for reimbursement, on the principal's promise that he shall lose nothing thereby;⁹⁰ and a factor guilty of conversion of his principal's property has been held entitled to reimbursement for money properly advanced or expended before the conversion.⁹¹

A settlement in full between a factor who has sold goods on credit and his principal bars any claim thereafter for advances, in the absence of fraud or mistake.⁹²

§ 44. Security of Factor in General

A factor, in the absence of a special agreement to the contrary, has the personal security of his principal, as well as a lien on the goods, for his charges and advances, and under some authorities, although not others, he may proceed against the principal before resorting to the goods. Unless the principal directs the application of the proceeds of sale, the factor may direct such application to whichever of his demands he prefers.

Rate of interest

(1) Where a factor makes advances as a loan to his principal in America, on goods to be consigned to the factor for sale in Australia, the rate of interest is that allowed at the place where the loan is made, in the absence of an express provision that it be repaid in Australia with the interest allowed in that country. U.S.—Wittkowski v. Harris, C.C.N.C., 64 F. 712.

(2) Where a contract between a commission merchant in New York and a person in another state stipulates that the latter shall send merchandise to the former to be sold, and that the former shall make advances, to be repaid with commissions and interest out of the sales, the rate of interest is to be determined by the laws of New York, which is the place of the performance. tures and advances by the factor, he may recover the difference from his principal.⁹⁴

Under some authorities, the factor may, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, recover from his principal for advances even before the goods are sold,⁹⁵ provided, it has been held, he has made a diligent effort for a reasonable time to sell the goods.⁹⁶ Where this rule prevails, however, a factor who has not discharged his obligation to his principal cannot demand repayment unless he has sold the goods or is able to show that the goods cannot be sold at all;⁹⁷ he cannot demand repayment until he is in a position to terminate the agency and make final settlement with the principal, but when he attains that position, then settlement may be made even though the goods have not been sold.⁹⁸

Under a different view, where the contract is an ordinary one between the principal and the factor, there is no implied agreement that advances, made under a belief by the factor that he is fully protected by the goods consigned to him, shall be repaid by the principal before the goods are sold,⁹⁹ and the factor must first resort to the goods consigned or their proceeds before he can enforce his claim against the principal personally,¹ unless it appears that the advance was made on the personal credit of the principal as well as the goods consigned,² or unless the principal relieves him of the necessity of first resorting to the goods.³ The rule requiring the factor first to resort to the goods is not altered by a provision for the payment of interest and allowing the principal to fix the price of the goods.⁴

Since all that the factor can require of his principal is indemnity, that is, the amount actually paid by him in excess of the proceeds of the consignment, if the holder of bills drawn on the factor receives the goods from him as payment in full, although the goods are of less value than the amount of the bills, the principal is entitled to the benefit of the transaction and the factor cannot charge him the difference between the amount of the bills and the value of the goods.⁵

Order of applying proceeds or payments. In the absence of a different application, credits are applied to debts in the order of time in which they accrue;⁶ but unless the principal directs the application of the proceeds,⁷ the factor has a right to direct the application thereof to whichever of his demands he prefers.⁸ The factor cannot, however, in order to provide for the payment of debts not yet due, apply proceeds already in his hands to such debts, instead of to debts already due.⁹

goods on which advances have been made, the proceeds shall be applied on certain notes held by the factor against the principal and not on the principal's open account, such assent is subject to the implied condition that the principal will keep up the required margins and continue solvent, and if the principal becomes bankrupt, the factor, after notice, is entitled to sell the goods for the best market price and credit the proceeds against the open account and commission before applying any part thereof to the notes.¹⁰

Waiver of rights by factor. The factor may waive his recourse against any security which he may enjoy;¹¹ thus, he may, by agreement, waive his recourse against the principal personally and limit his remedy for the recovery of his advances to the goods consigned,¹² or he may renounce his lien on the goods without affecting his remedy against the principal personally.¹³

Liability of assignee. A transfer by the principal of his interest in the goods does not render the transferee personally liable for the factor's advances and commissions, in the absence of an agreement by the transferee to that effect;¹⁴ and such agreement cannot be inferred from the fact that accounts are rendered by the factor to the transferee, and received by the latter without objection, charging the transferee with advances and interest.¹⁵

§ 45. Lien of Factor

- a. In general
- b. Indebtedness secured
- c. Facts necessary to existence of lien

a. In General

A factor has a general lien, which arises independently of any special agreement therefor, on the goods consigned to him, while in his possession, or on the proceeds of a sale thereof, for all commissions, advances, and expenditures properly incurred; this lien generally cannot be transferred, but the factor's personal representative or assignee for the benefit of creditors succeeds to his right of lien.

It is a well-settled rule of the common law that a factor has a general lien on the goods consigned to him, while in his possession, for all commissions, advances, and expenditures properly incurred in the course of the relation of principal and factor.¹⁶ This right of the factor is recognized in equity as well as at law,¹⁷ and in some jurisdictions is directly or in effect declared by statute;¹⁸ in addition, a special statute may operate to create a lien in favor of a factor under circumstances not sufficient to create a lien at common law.¹⁹

The "lien of a factor at common law," within the meaning of a provision in a statute creating a special factor's lien that nothing in the statute shall be construed as an abrogation of the lien of a factor at common law, means a lien that did not come into existence through statutory enactment.

Construction of statute

(1) Statute must be strictly construed when it is in derogation of common law.

N.J.—Taylor v. New Line Industries, 117 A.2d 643, 37 N.J.Super. 501.

(2) Amendment to statute respecting liens on merchandise to secure repayment of loan made on security of such merchandise, as far as it indicates purpose to particularize and

As a general rule, a factor's lien is a personal privilege, of which he may avail himself or not, as he pleases,²⁰ and, as no question can arise on it except as between the principal and the factor, it can be asserted by the factor alone and cannot, as a general rule, be transferred;²¹ if he refuses to assert it, no one can assert it for him.²² It cannot be set up as against the principal by an attachment or execution creditor of the factor.²³ The factor's executor or administrator, however, succeeds to his right of lien,²⁴ as does also his assignee for the benefit of creditors.²⁵

What law governs. Whether or not a factor's lien which is recognized as valid and enforceable in one jurisdiction is valid and enforceable against goods located in another jurisdiction has been held to depend on the laws of the latter jurisdiction.²⁶

Agreement or instructions. Although the compensation, advances, or expenses for which a lien is claimed must be earned or incurred under a contract, express or implied, with the principal,²⁷ the factor's right to a lien for such claims is implied or inferred by law from the relation of the parties, and arises independently of any express agreement therefor;²⁸ it is deemed to exist in all cases until the contrary is clearly established.²⁹ The factor, however, cannot claim a lien where such claim would be inconsistent with the agreement between him and his principal,³⁰ or where expenditures or advances are made on the principal's personal credit exclusively.³¹ So, where the factor receives and assents to specific instructions as to the application of the proceeds of the goods, he can claim a lien on such proceeds only in case there is a surplus after applying them as instructed.³²

Subject matter of lien. A factor's lien is available against the goods in his possession,³³ and against other property which comes into his hands in the course of his dealings with the principal.³⁴ If the goods have been sold, the lien extends to the proceeds of the sale in his hands,³⁵ or, if the sale is on credit, to the debt or securities taken for the price.³⁶ A factor's lien agreement may be construed as creating a lien on all accounts receivable, including accounts resulting from the sale of merchandise not subject to the lien.^{36.5} The lien extends only to so much of the goods or proceeds as is necessary to secure the claim.³⁷

Where the goods have been destroyed, it has been held that the factor's lien extends to the proceeds of an insurance policy taken out on them.³⁸ Where the goods of different shippers are covered by the amplify subject covered by original act, must be construed in light of language used, notwithstanding courts may have implied contrary intent because of absence of such particularization in original statute. same bill of lading, the factor has no right to hold the goods of one shipper for charges on the goods of the other.³⁹

A lien resting on statute extends only to such property as is contemplated by the terms of the statute.⁴⁰ Accordingly the word "goods," as used in a statute, has been held to include all personal chattels other than things in action and money.^{40.5}

A factor's lien secures his compensation, his proper expenses and advances, and liabilities incurred by him for his principal. The lien generally covers not only expenditures and liabilities in connection with a particular consignment, but also the general balance of accounts in his favor.

A factor's lien secures his commissions or other compensation,⁴¹ and liabilities incurred by him for his principal;⁴² but it has been held that in the absence of a special agreement, the factor's lien on the goods does not extend to an indebtedness which he can call on the principal to pay on demand or at a specified time,⁴³ and it has also been held not to extend to a claim for damages arising from the principal's refusal to receive goods purchased by the factor.⁴⁴

A borrower's contingent liability on the sale of its accounts receivable can be secured by a factor's lien under a special statute.^{44.5}

Expenses and advances. The factor's lien secures his advances made on the faith of the consignment,⁴⁵ unless they are made without the principal's authorization;⁴⁶ and it also secures all expenses incurred or disbursements made to preserve and protect the property,⁴⁷ including payments for customs duties,⁴⁸ freight,⁴⁹ insurance,⁵⁰ salvage,⁵¹ storage in the factor's warehouse,⁵² and interest on advances made by him.⁵³

General balance of accounts. As a general rule, the lien of the factor covers not only the expenditures and liabilities incurred with regard to the particular consignment, but also the general balance of accounts in his favor growing out of similar dealings between him and his principal.⁵⁴ On the other hand, the factor cannot claim a lien for expenses and advances with respect to a particular consignment where the general balance of accounts is in favor of the principal.⁵⁵ Also, the factor cannot claim a lien for a general balance in opposition to the terms of a special contract under which the goods are received;⁵⁶ nor can there be a lien for a general balance where the relation of principal and factor does not exist,⁵⁷ as where there was but a single transaction between the parties.⁵⁸

After the principal's death, the factor's lien for a general balance then accrued does not attach to property coming into the factor's possession thereafter by order of the principal's representative.⁵⁹

Indebtedness incurred outside of agency. A factor's lien for a general balance of accounts extends only to debts incurred between the parties in their relation as principal and factor, and does not cover a debt due from the principal to the factor but not connected with the purposes of their relation as principal and factor.⁶⁰

c. Facts Necessary to Existence of Lien

- (1) In general
- (2) Possession by factor

(1) In General

A factor is not entitled to a lien unless he has complied with all contractual and statutory requirements; and, as a general rule, a factor's lien can exist only where the principal is the lawful owner of the goods.

A factor is not entitled to a lien unless he has complied with all contractual⁶¹ and statutory⁶² requirements therefor.

As a general rule, a factor's lien can exist only where the principal is the lawful owner of the goods, and if a factor receives goods from a person who has no title thereto, he cannot assert his lien as against the true and legal owner;⁶³ and this is especially true where the factor has knowledge that his consignor is not the owner or has not a good

title.⁶⁴ If the principal, after shipping the goods, parts with the title before the factor gets possession, no lien arises.⁶⁵ However, the principal's fraud in obtaining title does not affect a factor who has no notice thereof, and in such case the lien attaches as if the title were unquestioned.⁶⁶

Under a statute so providing, every person in whose name merchandise is shipped is to be deemed the true owner thereof so far as to entitle the consignee to a lien thereon for money advanced or negotiable security given to or for the use of the person in whose name the shipments have been made, or for any money or negotiable security received by the persons in whose name such shipments have been made to one for the use of such consignee.⁶⁷ It is necessary, in order to bring a shipment within such provision, that the goods shall have been shipped in the name of another with the consent of the true owner;⁶⁸ the provision does not apply where such shipment has been made without his consent,⁶⁹ as where goods have been wrongfully taken,⁷⁰ or where the property has been intrusted to an agent to ship in the owner's name and the agent ships it in his own name and obtains advances thereon,⁷¹ nor does it apply to or include one who discounts a draft drawn by the consignor on the consignee but not accepted, since the act is designed only to protect factors, agents, and con-

*The true owner may be estopped by his conduct to deny the right of the factor as against a third person to a lien for advances made on goods received by him.*⁷⁴

(2) Possession by Factor

In order that a factor's lien may attach to goods or their proceeds, the factor must have actual or constructive possession thereof, unless it is otherwise provided by statute. To have sufficient constructive possession, he must generally have control of the property.

The lien of a factor belongs to the class known as possessory liens;⁷⁵ and it is a well-settled rule that the factor must have either the actual or the constructive possession of the goods, or their proceeds, in order that his lien may attach thereto,⁷⁶ unless it is otherwise provided by statute.⁷⁷ Necessarily, a lien cannot be acquired before the goods come into his possession,⁷⁸ or after his possession has ceased.⁷⁹

The possession of the factor, in order to entitle him to a lien on the funds or property, must have been acquired lawfully, and in good faith;⁸⁰ and although his possession is generally regarded as the possession of the principal, for the purpose of sustaining his lien the factor's possession is his own and not that of the principal.⁸¹

Actual possession by the factor is sufficient to support his lien,⁸² and it has been stated, in some cases, that actual possession is required;⁸³ but according to the more common view it is not necessary that the factor have actual possession of the goods or proceeds, constructive possession being sufficient,⁸⁴ as where he has possession through his agent.⁸⁵ What constitutes sufficient constructive possession by the factor to support his lien depends largely on the kind and nature of the property, the situation of the parties, and other circumstances peculiar to each case,⁸⁶ but in general the factor's possession is sufficient if the property is so appropriated to him as to place it under his control,⁸⁷ or if, where the goods consigned to him are bulky in character, he exercises dominion over them after they have reached their destination.⁸⁸

It has been held that the factor's possession is sufficient where the shipper's receipt or bill of lading is indorsed and delivered to him,⁸⁹ and that the assignment of the bill of lading as collateral security conveys title to the goods, and gives the factor a security for his advances independent of his lien as factor.⁹⁰ His possession is not sufficient where the sole purpose for which goods are delivered to him is to have them delivered to the purchaser,⁹¹ or where the goods are merely marked and invoiced to him.⁹² The factor has no lien where he comes into possession of property after the principal has assigned his rights to the property to another.^{92.5}

Goods received after principal's death. Where the principal dies before the goods are in transitu to the factor, the fact that the goods subsequently come into his hands by order of the personal representative does not entitle the factor to a lien thereon for a general balance of accounts due to him and incurred in the lifetime of the principal;⁹³ nor has he a lien for advances made in the principal's lifetime on the faith of the future consignment of the identical goods which subsequently reach his hands from the personal representative.⁹⁴

Goods in transit. Goods consigned to a factor for sale without any special agreement between the factor and the principal with regard thereto are, while in transit, subject to the directions of the principal, and the factor, before he acquires the actual possession of the goods, has not such a constructive possession thereof as will entitle him to a lien thereon for his general balance of accounts,⁹⁵ unless he is entitled to a lien, in such a case, by virtue of a statutory provision.⁹⁶ This rule applies even though the bill of lading is taken in the name of the factor, provided the delivery to the carrier is not made with the intention of passing a special property in the goods to the factor.⁹⁷

On the other hand, although there is authority to the contrary,⁹⁸ where advances are made by the factor on the faith of a particular consignment, he may, under a number of authorities, acquire a lien on the goods while in transit, to the extent of such advances, although the consignment is made without any special agreement between the principal and the factor;⁹⁹ but the consignment must be made to him in terms and he must make advances or acceptances on the faith of it.¹

Where the consignment to the factor is made in pursuance of an agreement between the principal and the factor, in pursuance of which the factor has made advances to the principal on the faith of the consignment, the delivery to the carrier of the goods consigned to the factor, with the intent to comply with the agreement, gives to the factor a lien on the goods from the time of such delivery;² and it has been held that, in such a case, simply notifying the factor of the consignment is sufficient, as between him and the principal, although the principal retains the bill of lading.³ A mere agreement to ship the goods, however, without an actual shipment, will not give the factor a lien thereon.⁴

Equitable lien. It has been held that an equitable lien may arise for advances without possession where the advances are made on an agreement to consign, although the goods are not shipped to the factor;⁵ but on the other hand it has been held that, although the parties attempt in good faith to create a lien by agreement, which fails because possession of the property remains in the principal, an equitable lien will not arise.⁶

A factor's lien is superior to the equitable claims of third persons of which he had no notice at the time he acquired the lien, and it has been held superior to various particular claims of third persons, including that of a creditor of the principal who levies an attachment or execution on the goods; but it is subordinate to an outstanding legal title, or a paramount equity of which the factor has notice before his lien attaches.

A factor's lien is superior to the equitable claims of third persons to the goods, of which claims the factor had no notice at the time the lien was acquired.⁷ So, after the lien has attached, it is superior to the claim of the principal's vendor, who has not received the price of his goods;⁸ to the claim of a subsequent purchaser or assignee from the principal,⁹ especially where the purchaser or assignee has notice of the factor's lien at the time of the sale or assignment;¹⁰ to the claim of the fac-

tor's vendee to whom the goods have not been delivered;¹¹ to the claim of a subsequent bona fide holder of the bill of lading;¹² to the claim of a person who has made advances to the principal and to whom the factor is instructed to transmit the proceeds, but of whose advancements the factor has no notice;¹³ to the claim of one who makes advances without receiving the bill of lading;¹⁴ and, under at least one statute, to the claim of one who purchases, within a limited time, from the person to whom the factor had sold.¹⁵

Under at least one statute, the factor is regarded as a privileged creditor whose lien is superior to all privileges except those for wages and rents; and this privilege or preference is not affected by a respite granted to the consignor by a majority of his creditors.¹⁶

Second factor. A factor's lien is superior to the claim of a second factor, with notice, to whom a part of the goods are consigned in violation of the original contract;¹⁷ but the second factor has priority where the property or collateral security is transferred to him by the first factor.¹⁸

Factor's lien inferior. It is well settled that the factor's lien is subordinate to an outstanding legal title, or to a paramount equity of which the factor has notice before his lien attaches by virtue of his possession.¹⁹ Thus, it has been held that a factor cannot claim a lien on the goods as against a person who has made advances on the bill of lading and to whom the bill of lading,²⁰ or a duplicate bill,²¹ has been transferred. Where a factor makes advancements during the principal's lifetime, but does not sell the property until after his death, his lien has been held to be subject to the lien of the principal's widow and minor children for support.²²

Creditors of principal. The principal cannot, by drawing on the factor in favor of another creditor, prefer the latter's claim.²³ Where the factor's lien has properly attached, it is superior to the general claim of an antecedent creditor of the principal,²⁴ and to the claim of a creditor of the principal who subsequently levies an attachment or execution on the goods;²⁵ but the factor must have acquired possession of the goods or bill of lading before the creditor levied his attachment or execution, otherwise his lien will not be entitled to priority.²⁶

A factor cannot claim a lien for a general balance of account against the owner, over an attaching creditor, in disregard of a statute.²⁷

§ 47. — Waiver, Loss, or Discharge

A factor's lien, once it has attached, may be waived only by express terms or necessary implication. The factor may waive or lose it by any act or claim inconsistent with its continuance, as where he enters into a contract with his principal which is inconsistent with the lien, or voluntarily parts with the possession; and he may lose it by fraud or misconduct in transacting his principal's business. Payment or tender by the principal to the factor of the amount due discharges the lien.

Where the lien of the factor has once attached, it cannot, as a general rule, be defeated or affected by the principal or a third person without the con-

Factor required to show superiority

Where a factor of attachment debtor in proceedings by special scire facias against garnishee in attachment claimed right to possession of goods manufactured by debtor which were in possession of garnishee to whom they had been sent by debtor, to be processed, factor, under statutory plea of no title in debtor, must show a lien on goods superior to claim of attaching creditors to justify surrender of goods to him.

sent of the factor.²⁸ it may be waived only by express terms or necessary implication,²⁹ and is not waived, in the absence of fraud, by holding out the principal as owner,³⁰ or by failing to assert the lien when there is no duty to do so;³¹ nor is it affected by the death of the principal.³² It has been further held that the sale of goods without an obligation to account for the proceeds does not render invalid a factor's lien on the merchandise remaining in stock,^{32.5} and that the lien is not invalidated by the failure of a factor to require or receive from the principal a monthly inventory, as required by the agreement,^{32.10} or by the retention of the down payment by the borrower on the sale of goods by him.^{32.15}

On the other hand, the factor may himself waive or lose the lien by any act or claim on his part which is inconsistent with its continuance,³³ as where, when a demand is made on him by his principal for the goods, he refuses to deliver possession and assigns other reasons than his right to a lien on the goods as the ground for his refusal,³⁴ or where he wrongfully sells the goods;³⁵ and if he makes such sale without collecting the price, equity will not give him a lien as against general creditors on other property purchased by him for the principal.³⁶

Where a factor assents to a conveyance of the goods by his principal, without claiming his lien for a general balance, he is estopped to assert such lien as against the purchaser;³⁷ but he is not estopped to claim a lien for advances made on the consignment by his mere failure to inform the purchaser from the principal that such advances had been made, at the time when the purchaser deposited the receipts for the goods with him and directed that they should be sold on his account.³⁸ An assignment of the lien after proceedings to enforce it are begun and the rights of the parties are fixed does not destroy it, for it is merged in the suit.³⁹

Contract inconsistent with lien. A factor waives his lien where he enters into an express or implied contract with his principal which is inconsistent with the continued existence of the lien,⁴⁰ as where he extends the time of payment beyond the time when the lien would naturally terminate,⁴¹ or accepts other security for the debt with an intention to rely on it exclusively,⁴² or agrees to look to the personal responsibility of the principal.⁴³

Surrender of possession. A factor waives his lien by voluntarily parting with the possession of the property, so as to lose control of it,⁴⁴ and the lien is not revived by his accidentally regaining possession of the property;⁴⁵ but if thereafter the property is again placed in the hands of the factor as such, his lien will again attach.⁴⁶ He does not lose his lien, however, where he is wrongfully deprived of possession of the property,⁴⁷ or where he delivers possession of it under a special agreement whereby he retains control of it.⁴⁸

Misconduct. A factor may lose his lien by his fraud, negligence, or misconduct in the transaction of his principal's business,⁴⁹ as where he wrongfully pledges the goods,⁵⁰ or suffers them to be attached,⁵¹ or wrongfully fails or refuses to render an account.⁵²

Discharge of lien. The payment⁵³ or tender⁵⁴ by the principal to the factor of the amount due him discharges the factor's lien.

§ 48. — Enforcement and Preservation

As a general rule, a factor may enforce his lien by retaining the property, proceeds, or securities until the claims for which his lien exists are paid; if the principal fails to satisfy the lien within a reasonable time, the factor may sell, in the usual course of trade, enough of the property to satisfy it. He may bring a suit in equity to enforce his lien for a general balance.

As a general rule, a factor may enforce his lien by retaining the property, proceeds, or securities until the charges, commissions, or other claims for which his lien exists are paid;⁵⁵ and if the goods are sold, he may apply the proceeds to the payment of his claims.⁵⁶ If the principal or his assignee demands the property, he must first satisfy the factor's lien thereon;⁵⁷ and this rule applies to creditors of the principal.⁵⁸

By way of preserving his lien, the factor may take the steps authorized by statute for that purpose,⁵⁹ or he may sue to regain possession of the property when he has been wrongfully deprived thereof,⁶⁰ or to recover its value⁶¹ and damages for its detention.⁶² Where the factor stipulates that the title to the goods shall be in him as security for the money advanced, he may maintain replevin against the principal, his representative, or his creditors, for such of the goods as can be identified.⁶³

Sale. As a general rule, if the principal fails to satisfy the lien within a reasonable time or on a reasonable demand, the factor may sell, in the usual course of trade, enough of the property to satisfy his lien.⁶⁴ Where the principal transfers the goods to a third person subject to the factor's lien, and the factor sells the goods for his advances, but the proceeds are insufficient to reimburse him, such third person is not liable for the deficit where he has done nothing amounting to an assumption of the principal's debt.⁶⁵

Suit to enforce. A factor may bring a suit in equity to enforce his lien for a general balance on the goods, and will be entitled in such a suit to a deficiency decree in case the proceeds of the goods are insufficient to satisfy his claim;⁶⁶ and it has been held that, where he has a lien on notes in his hands belonging to his principal, he can satisfy it only by some proceeding, recognized by law, to foreclose his interest and extinguish the title of his principal.⁶⁷

Judgment held defective; proper charges

A judgment, foreclosing a lien, which directed the officer executing the order of sale to pay out of the proceeds all usual and customary current charges accrued, including all cash advanced and paid for freight thereon, was held defective in permitting the officer to determine the law and the facts as to what the proper charges on such items should be.

- g. Evidence
- h. Trial and determination

a. In General; Form of Remedy

Remedies available to a principal against his factor may include, dependent on the circumstances of the case, an action for money had and received, a suit for an accounting, a suit for damages for breach of contract, an action on the case for damages, assumpsit on an account stated, assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, and an action of trover.

Where the principal seeks to recover of his factor the proceeds of the sale of goods consigned to him, a proper remedy is an action for money had and received;⁶⁸ but in order that such an action may be maintained, there must have been an actual sale of the goods, since such action will not lie as long as the goods remain unsold.⁶⁹ There is such a trust relationship between the principal and factor as will enable the principal to sue in equity for an accounting;⁷⁰ but this form of action may be maintained only where there is a series of transactions, and not where there is but a single transaction.⁷¹ The principal is not precluded from an equitable accounting by first availing himself of the remedy of discovery.⁷² It has also been held that the common-law action of account render may be maintained;⁷³ or the principal may be entitled to a quantum meruit recovery.^{73.5}

Where the factor has violated his instructions or has been guilty of another omission or breach of duty, the principal may sue for damages for breach of contract,⁷⁴ although this is not the exclusive remedy;⁷⁵ and under proper circumstances he may maintain an action on the case for damages against the factor⁷⁶ or assumpsit on an account stated, where the amount due is ascertained.⁷⁷ An action in assumpsit for breach of an agreement to pay the market value of goods may be based on either an express or an implied contract when it appears that the terms of the agreement have been fully performed with the exception of paying the stipulated sum thereunder.^{77.5}

Where the factor has been guilty of acts amounting to a conversion of the goods, the principal may maintain an action of trover against him.⁷⁸

Where, in accordance with a consignment agreement, the consignor takes an assignment of the consignee's accounts receivable, he does not make an election of remedies so as to foreclose himself from suing on the debt.^{78.5}

Goods sold and delivered. As a general rule, an action for goods sold and delivered will not lie against the factor,⁷⁹ except where the factor uses the goods as his own or sells them to himself;⁸⁰ and this is true although the factor has made an unauthorized sale of the goods⁸¹ or has been guilty of a delay in the sale;⁸² but it has also been held that where the factor sells the goods at a place beyond the shipping point in violation of his contract, the principal may sue in assumpsit for their value as for goods sold and delivered.⁸³

Injunction. The principal may have an injunction and a receiver against his factor in case of misconduct or insolvency, whereby the property is endangered, although the consignment is to sell on a del credere commission.⁸⁴

b. Defenses and Counterclaims

A factor sued by his principal may set up available defenses, and may counterclaim for expenses incurred or for damages sustained by reason of the principal's default.

The fact that the principal has accepted notes from the factor guaranteeing payment for all sales on a credit basis under the terms of the contract does not bar an action for accounting for goods consigned to the factor;⁸⁵ but it is a matter of defense whether the acceptance of a check amounts to a waiver of all disputed claims.^{85.5} The recovery of commissions by the factor is no bar to an action for his breach of contract.^{85.10}

In an action for the proceeds received by the factor, he may set up as a defense the principal's want of title to the goods consigned;⁸⁶ and where the factor informs his principal that there is a balance due him for goods sold, and the principal draws for it and his bill is protested, the factor may show in defense to the principal's suit for the balance that he was mistaken as to there being a balance due, and that he had sold the goods on credit and had not yet been paid for them.⁸⁷ Where a factor is sued at law by his principal for a breach of trust whereby he has substituted himself in place of the purchaser, he may set up fraud or any other matter of defense which the purchaser could have set up if the suit had been against him.⁸⁸

It is no defense to a suit for an accounting against a factor that there is pending against him a suit by the government to recover as a penalty the value of part of the goods consigned to him because they had been undervalued by the principal in fraud of the revenue law.⁸⁹ An agreement to divide profits which is not legally or equitably binding on the principal is no defense against a bill for accounting for all profits.⁹⁰

Breach of alleged guaranty. Where defendants agreed to sell goods for the shipper for specified commissions, and knew at the time the goods were packed that they did not meet the requirements of an alleged guaranty as to grade, the shipper is not precluded from recovery for breach of the agreement because of breach of the alleged guaranty.^{90.5}

Counterclaim. In an action for the proceeds the factor may counterclaim for expenses incurred by him with respect to the goods consigned,⁹¹ or for damages sustained by reason of the principal's default.⁹² A factor who refuses on demand to surrender the proceeds of a sale cannot in an action of conversion defeat a recovery by purchasing a claim of a third person against the principal and interposing it as a counterclaim, because the principal's action is in tort, and because defendant by such purchase assumes a position incompatible with his duty as an agent and in direct conflict with his principal's interest.⁹³

c. Accrual of Action; Demand

The general rule, subject to various exceptions, is that the factor must be placed in default by a demand before an action for the proceeds of the goods can be maintained against him by the principal. If the goods remain unsold in the hands of the factor, a demand and a refusal must be made before the owner can maintain an action for them.

As a general rule, unless the factor fails to remit pursuant to instructions, an action cannot be maintained against him by the principal for the proceeds of the sale until a demand therefor has been made,⁹⁴ even though the factor is acting for a foreign principal.⁹⁵ However, it has been held that an action for the proceeds may be maintained without a previous demand, where there is an agreement or instruction to remit within a fixed time, which the factor fails to do;⁹⁶ where the usage or course of dealings between the parties imposes on the factor the duty to remit;⁹⁷ where the factor unreasonably neglects to render his account,⁹⁸ especially where the factor is acting for a foreign principal;⁹⁹ where an account has been rendered in which the balance is subject to the order of the principal, unless there is an understanding that the principal shall draw for the balance;¹ or where the factor has been guilty of conversion.²

The principal cannot recover damages from the factor for a failure to sell unless he is ready and offers to retake the goods and relieve the factor from further responsibility.³

Action for goods. If goods are in the hands of the factor and unsold, a demand and a refusal must be made before the owner can maintain an action for them.⁴ The purpose of the demand is to give the person in possession an opportunity to comply without incurring liability; the demand must be made when the demanding party has a right to possession, and must specifically indicate the chattels demanded.^{4,5} While a formal demand is not necessary, the statement or request constituting the demand must advise that the surrender of possession is wanted "then and there."^{4,10}

Where the factor exchanges property intrusted to him for sale, for other property, the principal may maintain an action for the value of the property without a demand for its return or for an accounting.⁵

d. Parties

Under proper circumstances, one of several owners may maintain an action against the factor; but where fire insurance moneys have been paid as a total sum to the factor, the proper remedy is a suit wherein all the owners are made parties.

An owner of only part of the goods consigned, who, under authority of the other owners, has entered into the factorage contract as principal, may sue the factor for damages to the entire lot.⁶ One of two joint owners who has informed the factor of the extent of his ownership and has given separate instructions as to his share may maintain a separate action against the factor for violation of his instructions.⁷

Where the factor collects fire insurance moneys paid as a total sum on goods owned by several persons, one of such persons cannot maintain a separate action for his share, but the proper remedy is a suit in which all the owners are made parties to enable the court to determine the extent of each owner's interest.⁸ Where an agent for the sale of goods under the terms of his agreement consigns them to a factor for sale, the owner may sue the factor for any unfaithfulness on his part, in the name of the agent for the owner's benefit, or he may sue in his own name.⁹

Mortgaged crop. A shipper has been held entitled to maintain an action for breach of an agreement to sell a mortgaged crop without showing that the mortgage was paid, where the cause of action is in the shipper either as principal or as agent.^{9,5}

e. Pleading

The usual rules of pleading in civil actions apply to the declaration or complaint, the plea or answer, and the rejoinder. An amendment which does not state a different cause of action may be permitted.

In accordance with the usual rules of pleading, the declaration or complaint in an action by a principal against his factor must be sufficient to state a cause of action.¹⁰ If one count in the declaration is good although all the other counts are bad, it is

Ala.—J. H. Arnold & Co. v. Gibson, 113 So. 25, 216 Ala. 314.

Action under Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act

(1) Where the complaint in an action for the purchase price of melons alleging the making of a reparation order by the secretary of agriculture does not allege that defendant was a commission merchant, dealer, or broker, or show that the transaction was one in interstate or foreign com-

sufficient.¹¹ The complaint need not anticipate defenses;¹² and a declaration which is curable by amendment cannot be objected to after verdict.¹³

Where the purchaser refused to accept the goods on their arrival and the factor resold for a smaller amount but refused to tell his principal the name of the original purchaser, thus depriving him of resort against such purchaser, it need not be alleged in an action for the difference between the two prices that the original purchaser was financially responsible.¹⁴ When goods are received to be sold at certain prices or returned on demand and they are sold and the money received, no special demand need be alleged in an action for the money; but it is otherwise if the action is for a failure to return the goods.¹⁵ Where the action by the principal is for negligence or other breach of duty on the part of the factor, the declaration or complaint should allege facts which show such negligence or breach of duty,¹⁶ and should also aver the facts from which the duty to act springs, although it is not necessary to set out the particular acts of diligence which should have been employed in the performance of that duty.¹⁷

Plea or answer, and set-off. In accordance with the usual rules of pleading, if the factor defends on the ground that the goods of plaintiff were destroyed without defendant's fault, an allegation that he had used proper diligence to sell the goods and had failed is necessary.¹⁸ Where the complaint alleges a debt on a contract, the factor may plead a counterclaim for expenses incurred on the consignment;¹⁹ and in an action for goods sold and delivered by a factor to himself disbursements made by him for storage prior to the sale must be pleaded affirmatively in set-off, and cannot be deducted from the price under a general denial.²⁰

Rejoinder. It has been held that in an action of assumpsit brought by the principal against the factor for money in his hands, where the factor sets up in reduction of the principal's demand an account for expenses incurred by him, the principal cannot set up in rejoinder the negligence of the factor, but must bring his action for damages.²¹

An amendment to a complaint which does not state a different cause of action may be permitted.²²

In a bail-trover action against a consignee, amendments to the answer attempting to show that the consignor does not have title because of a conditional vendor's title have been held to be without merit because they seek to deraign the consignor's title.^{22.5}

f. Issues, Proof, and Variance

The usual rules as to issues, proof, and variance apply.

In accordance with the rules which govern the issues, proof, and variance in civil actions generally, only such questions should be submitted to the jury as are properly put in issue by the pleadings;²³ the proof must be confined to the issues,²⁴ and, al-merce, or that there was any failure or refusal truly and correctly to account, or that the complaint filed with the department stated any other facts, the cause of action, if any, stated in the complaint does not arise under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act.

Failure to instruct as creating issue of contributory negligence

In an action for defendant's breach of an agreement to sell plaintiffs' barley as instructed by plaintiffs, contributory negligence was not an issue, since if plaintiffs directed defendant to sell, it became his duty to exercise reasonable diligence to execute the direction, while if no directions were given, defendant was relieved of liability, not because of contributory negligence, but because it had no duty to act.

though a material variance will be fatal,²⁵ an immaterial variance will be disregarded.²⁶ A general denial places in issue the allegations of the complaint.²⁷

In an action for the proceeds of a sale of certain goods, where there is a counterclaim for advances made on those and other goods, and the court finds that the total proceeds exceed the advances by a sum smaller than that claimed in the complaint, the mere form in which the issues are presented will not preclude a recovery of such sum.²⁸

g. Evidence

- (1) Presumptions and burden of proof
- (2) Admissibility
- (3) Weight and sufficiency

(1) Presumptions and Burden of Proof

The burden is on the principal to prove his case, and the factor has the burden to prove an affirmative defense. Negligence or breach of duty is not presumed, and the factor has no burden of proving diligence unless the principal establishes a prima facie case of negligence.

In accordance with the usual rules in civil actions, the burden is on the principal to establish the facts which he alleges as a cause of action,²⁹ and on the factor to establish the facts which he relies on as ground of affirmative defense³⁰ or to support a plea of set-off.³¹ In an action against a factor for the proceeds of goods sold, the burden is generally on plaintiff to show that there has been a sale of the goods,³² unless the lapse of time, without an accounting, together with other circumstances raises a presumption that the factor has sold the goods and received the proceeds so as to authorize an action against him for money had and received;³³ but this presumption may be overcome by evidence that he has received no returns from the goods.³⁴

In a suit under the federal Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, the findings and order of the secretary of agriculture are prima facie correct,³⁵ and will prevail unless overcome by evidence;³⁶ but appellant has the right to seek to overcome their prima facie effect.³⁷ The court will assume that the secretary of agriculture would not have acted if he had lacked jurisdiction.³⁸

Negligence or misconduct. In the absence of proof, it will not be presumed that the factor has been guilty of negligence or other breach of duty,³⁹ or that the principal has suffered damage thereby,⁴⁰ and hence there is no burden on the factor of proving that he exercised due diligence in the performance of his duties.⁴¹ On the other hand, where the principal relies on negligence or other breach of duty on the part of the factor as a ground for recovery, the burden is on him to establish that fact,⁴² and the fact that he was damaged thereby.⁴³

Where, however, a prima facie case of negligence of the factor is established, the burden is on him to show facts relieving him from liability,⁴⁴ and this rule applies where the factor by his own testimony shows that in case of a sale on credit there was no inquiry or investigation as to the responsibility of the purchaser.⁴⁵ So, after proof of loss of the bailed property, the burden is on the consignee to show proper diligence on his part.^{45.5}

Where, in an action against a factor for conversion, he does not allege as a defense that he had sold the property which is unaccounted for, it will be presumed that he did not sell it, but concealed it with a view to appropriating it to his own use.⁴⁶

(2) Admissibility

Evidence is held admissible or inadmissible, in accordance with the rules applicable in civil actions generally.

In an action by a principal against his factor, evidence is held admissible⁴⁷ or inadmissible⁴⁸ in accordance with the general rules of evidence in civil actions. In an action for a negligent sale shortly before a sudden rise in the market price, evidence is inadmissible as to the original cost of the article or as to an expression by defendant to plaintiff, after the sale in question, of hopes to do better with another cargo which plaintiff had consigned at about the same time, together with evidence of the times and prices at which the second cargo is sold; and proof of the holding of other consignments by other persons for a better market is not relevant with regard to the propriety of the sale in controversy.⁴⁹ Proof of market value at the place of sale under the contract is proper for the purpose of showing that the factor obtained the best price, but evidence of its value at the place of shipment is inadmissible.⁵⁰

Evidence showing what price could have been obtained by the factor is admissible,⁵¹ but evidence of the sale price of other goods is inadmissible where it is not shown that the quality of the goods was the same.⁵² "Prices current" sent by a factor to his principal showing the price of goods in the factor's market on a certain date are admissible against him on an issue between him and the principal as to the market price at that time.⁵³ In an action against a factor for fraudulently selling goods on credit to an insolvent person, evidence of the pecuniary circumstances of the buyer of the goods and of his acts and conduct with respect to the goods after the purchase is admissible in connection with other evidence showing fraud in the sale, although it might be inadmissible if standing alone.⁵⁴

In an action against a factor to recover the proceeds of a sale under an agreement for a del credere commission, evidence which has a definite bearing on the terms and conditions of the agency and the

In bail-trover action against consignee of trailer for purpose of sale, evidence, introduced over objections of consignor, as to conduct of agent of conditional vendor in repossessing the trailer for consignor's alleged nonpayment of installments, which tended to negative any idea of legal proceedings to obtain possession and tended to excuse consignee from protecting the property as bailed, was irrelevant, immaterial, and harmful in that it set up for consignee a defense not permitted under law; and a telegram that agent of conditional vendor who had repossessed the trailer had informed the consignee of default in payment and had demanded and taken the trailer was inadmissible and should not have been admitted over objections.

transactions thereunder is admissible.⁵⁵ Evidence of a long delay in selling in a constantly falling market is admissible on the question of good faith and reasonable diligence of the factor.⁵⁶ In an action for damages for selling below the invoice price defendant may show in reduction of damages that the goods at the time of sale and down to the time of trial were worth no more than the price at which they were sold;⁵⁷ and, where the principal seeks by way of counterclaim to recover damages for the factor's breach of contract to ship and sell goods on his account, the fact that plaintiff inspected the goods before entering into the contract does not preclude him from showing for the purpose of reducing damages that the goods were of inferior quality.⁵⁸

(3) Weight and Sufficiency

The rules which govern the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in other civil actions apply in an action by a principal against his factor.

The rules which govern the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in other civil actions are applied in an action by a principal against his factor,⁵⁹ as in an action to recover the proceeds or the value of property consigned,⁶⁰ to recover brokerage charges wrongfully charged,⁶¹ or to recover damages caused by a wrongful delay in selling⁶² or caused by any other breach of the factorage contract.⁶³

Under the particular circumstances of various cases, evidence has been held sufficient⁶⁴ or insufficient⁶⁵ to show negligence of the factor; sufficient⁶⁶ or insufficient⁶⁷ to show fraud by the factor; or sufficient⁶⁸ or insufficient⁶⁹ to show a guarantee of price.

Other evidence has been held sufficient to show ownership of the property consigned,⁷⁰ the amount to which the principal was entitled,⁷¹ or the marketability of the goods,^{71.5} or to sustain a finding that an allowance which the consignee had made to a buyer was an honest correction for an erroneous shipment,^{71.10} or to sustain other findings.^{71.15}

L. Trial and Determination

The rules which govern in other civil actions apply in an action against a factor with regard to the determination of questions of law and fact and to the instructions to the jury.

In accordance with the general rule in civil actions, questions of law are for the court,⁸³ and questions of fact are for the determination of the jury.⁸⁴ Thus, it is ordinarily a question for the jury whether or not the factor followed his instructions,⁸⁵ and, unless what constitutes care or diligence is under the particular circumstances a question of law,⁸⁶ the jury must determine whether the factor exercised reasonable care, skill, and diligence in the matter,⁸⁷ as in caring for the goods,⁸⁸ or in effecting a sale,⁸⁹ whether he committed a breach of contract in neglecting to insure the goods consigned to him,⁹⁰ or whether he had waived his lien on the goods for advances.⁹¹

Where the instructions to the factor are in writing, their construction is generally a question for the court,⁹² unless a particular instruction is capable of two interpretations, in which case the question should be submitted to the jury to determine ings for seller on counts charging defendants with conversion in connection with sale of consigned items. Mass.—Rock-Ola Mfg. Corp. v. Music & Television Corp., 159 N.E. 417.

in what sense the instruction was understood by the factor.⁹³

The rules which govern in other civil actions are applied in an action against a factor with regard to the instructions to the jury.⁹⁴ Thus, an instruction which makes an incorrect assumption of fact,⁹⁵ or one which, although it purports to cover the whole case, omits an essential view of the case⁹⁶ or disregards facts in evidence,⁹⁷ is erroneous.

Where the evidence authorizes the inference that defendant made a contract with plaintiff and subsequently breached the contract, it is error to grant a nonsuit.⁹⁸ The direction of a verdict is proper where there is no conflict in the evidence and only one reasonable inference can be drawn therefrom.⁹⁹

A finding as to market value is immaterial where the judgment is not based on the value found.^{99.5} A commission merchant in a proceeding to enforce an award of the secretary of agriculture under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act cannot attack the findings of the secretary on the basis of evidence presented before him, particularly when the record of such evidence is not before the court,¹ but on an appeal from the award the appellant may challenge the findings for want of evidence with-

§ 50. — Damages

- a. In general
- b. For sale at improper place
- c. For sale at improper time
- d. For sale at unauthorized price

a. In General

The principal may recover his actual damages sustained by reason of the factor's violation of instructions or other breach of duty. Interest may be recovered if the factor delays in remitting payment for the goods after the sale.

Where a factor has violated his instructions, or has been guilty of other acts which render him liable for damages to his principal, the latter is entitled to recover the actual damages, that is, such damages as will compensate him for the loss or injury he has sustained, as a natural and proximate result of the factor's acts;³ and the rule of damages is the same whether the cause of action is for a breach of contract or for a violation of duty.⁴ The principal cannot recover speculative damages;⁵ and if no loss or injury has been sustained, no damages can be recovered,⁶ or at most only nominal

Taking of consigned property

(1) In bail-trover action against consignee of trailer for purpose of sale on alleged ground that consignee had not acted to prevent a taking thereof, instruction, that if jury found that there had been a conversion, then they should find for plaintiff as to the property which had been consigned, regardless of agreement that consignee assumed no responsibility for loss of trailer by fire, accident, or otherwise, and that the agreement did not supersede an act of converting, was proper. (2) In such action, instruction to the effect that consignment contract relieved defendant of all negligence

not amounting to willfulness or wantonness was reversible error, the true rule being that the defendant was bound to use ordinary diligence to prevent the taking of the property; and instruction that consignor had burden of proving the conversion by a preponderance of the evidence was erroneous, since, after proof of loss of the bailed property, the burden was on consignee to show proper diligence on his part. damages.⁷

Where the principal waives the tort and sues in assumpsit for the proceeds of goods sold, he can recover only the proceeds of the sale,⁸ and damages for not remitting at a proper time cannot be recovered.⁹

In the absence of special circumstances, the measure of damages for a conversion is the fair market value of the consigned merchandise when sold.^{9.5}

On an accounting, the principal is entitled to receive the full price of the article delivered to the factor for sale less the commission, although the factor accepted other articles from the purchaser in partial payment;¹⁰ and the principal is entitled to the full price received less commissions, although the factor had persuaded the principal to sell the property for a smaller price.¹¹ The principal is under a duty to minimize his loss as far as possible.¹² Where the property depreciates in value through unauthorized use of it by the factor, he is liable for the value the property would have had in the absence of such use.¹³

Interest. Where the contract requires the factor to make payments as the goods are sold, interest is properly recoverable from the date of demand until the date of payment.¹⁴ In an action for the balance of the proceeds from a series of sales, the principal was held entitled to interest from the date of the last sale accounted for by the factor rather than from the date of the final statement made by him.¹⁵

If the factor violates the contract as to the place of sale, he is liable for the difference between the market value at the place where the goods should have been sold and the price for which they were sold.

If the factor violates the contract as to the place of sale, he is liable for the actual loss to the principal, that is, the difference between the market value at the place where the goods should have been sold and the price for which they were sold;¹⁶ and in estimating this difference the highest value which the goods could have been sold for at the original market within a reasonable time after the conversion should be taken.¹⁷ Where, however, the goods net as much at the place where they are sold as they would have netted if sold at the proper place, the principal can recover no damages.¹⁸

Where a factor who has made advances on the goods is ordered to ship them to a place other than his residence for sale, but in the exercise of due diligence he is unable to ship to the place designated and ships to another place where the goods are sold, the measure of damages is, not the difference between the price obtainable at the place designated and the place of sale, but the difference between the price which might have been obtained at his residence and the price at the place of sale.¹⁹ Where, in disobedience of instructions, the factor sells his principal's goods, and, when subsequently directed to ship to another place, does not inform his principal of the sale, but buys other goods and ships them to the place designated, he is liable for the difference between the price for which the goods were sold at the place designated and the price obtained for the original consignment.²⁰

If the factor improperly delays in selling the goods, he will be liable for a loss incurred through a decline in the market price; and if he sells prior to the time authorized, he will be liable for any advance in price which could have been obtained.

Where the factor fails to sell the goods within the time his duty requires him to sell them, he will be liable to his principal for a loss incurred through a decline in the market price,²¹ and also for injury to the goods by reason of their being left in storage;²² but he will not be liable for more than the difference between the price available if instructions had been followed and a price subsequently offered to the principal and refused.²³

Where the factor sells in violation of his duty not to sell, he will be liable for any advance in price which could have been obtained from an increase in the market price²⁴ at the time a sale was authorized,²⁵ or, if no time is designated, within a reasonable time after the breach of duty,²⁶ less any expenses and loss due to keeping the property over,²⁷ or due to its inferior quality.²⁸

If there has been no decrease in value between the time the factor fails to sell as instructed and the time the principal learns of the violation of his instructions so as to impose on him the duty to affirm or disapprove the factor's conduct, it has been held that no damages can be recovered by the principal.²⁹ A failure to sell does not make the factor liable for a subsequent loss by fire, if such failure is not the proximate cause of the loss.³⁰

As a general rule, a factor who sells for less than the price fixed by the principal is liable for the actual damages sustained by the principal.

Where the factor sells the property for a price which has not received the owner's approval, he is liable for the fair value of the property.³¹ There are decisions to the effect that, where the factor sells for less than the price fixed by his principal, he is regarded as a purchaser at such fixed price, and is responsible to the principal therefor,³² notwithstanding it may be above the market price.³³ However, the rule supported by the weight of authority limits the factor's liability to the actual damages sustained by the principal, that is, the difference between the price obtained and the market value of the goods, taking into consideration any increase in price within a reasonable time after the sale by the factor,³⁴ or up to the date of the trial,³⁵ or to the time when action is commenced,³⁶ not to exceed the limit fixed by the principal;³⁷ and if the market price ever since the sale has been less than the price obtained, no damages are recoverable.³⁸

Where goods having no market value are sold by a factor at a price below that fixed by his principal, he is liable to the principal for the price fixed.³⁹

Guaranteed price. Where the factor expressly guarantees a fixed price on the sale of goods, the measure of damages in case of a sale below such price is the difference between the price guaranteed

§ 51. Actions by Factor against Principal

- a. In general
- b. Defenses
- c. Pleading; issues, proof, and variance
- d. Evidence
- e. Trial; judgment

a. In General

A factor may, in a proper case, maintain an action against the principal for the amount due him, but he cannot maintain an action for his advances without accounting for, or showing what has become of, the principal's goods or funds intrusted to his care. A principal who breaches his contract with his factor is liable for the damages sustained.

In addition to a suit to enforce his lien for commissions, advances, and charges, considered supra § 48, a factor may, in a proper case, especially where the goods are insufficient to satisfy his lien, maintain an action against the principal personally for the amount due him,⁴¹ and may file a bill against the principal for an accounting;⁴² but he cannot maintain an action for his advances without accounting for, or showing what has become of, the principal's goods or funds intrusted to his care.⁴³ Where goods have been consigned to be sold at a limited price, a factor may, after a seasonable time, if the price cannot be obtained, call for payment of his advances or further security and sue for the amount due.⁴⁴

Damages. A principal who breaches his contract with his factor is liable to the factor for the damages sustained.⁴⁵ Where the principal fails to furnish the goods as agreed and the factor has made contracts in his own name to sell the goods, the measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the goods and the contract price at the time of the breach.⁴⁶ If the consignor prevails on his counterclaim for neglect of the factor to sell the goods, and the goods are not yet sold, the consignor should be charged with the value of the goods at the place where they are to be sold in the computation of damages.⁴⁷

In an action by commission agents under an oral agreement to indemnify them for losses resulting from the unsatisfactory condition of the goods which constitute the subject of the agreement, the measure of damages is the amount paid to or for defendant on account of his goods which were not in accordance with the sample, as the agreement required.^{47.5}

In an action by a factor for his advances and disbursements, the principal may show, in bar or in reduction of the claim, want of diligence, or neglect, on the part of the factor, and may recoup or set off whatever damages he has sustained. A judgment in a prior suit in which the same issues were litigated may be asserted as res judicata.

an action for commissions on sales made by the principal in violation of an agreement that the factor should be sole agent of the principal's goods, a breach of a subsequent promise of the factor to be the principal's surety on a contract obtained by the principal for a sale of goods is no defense, since the factor had the right to recede from the promise and since the promise could have no effect on the contract between the principal and the factor.⁴⁹ After the factor has rendered his monthly statements for a long period of time, which statements have been admitted to be correct, it is too late to plead usury in defense of an action for a balance due the factor.⁵⁰

Where the principal has directed the factor to pay the transportation charges without limiting the amount and has agreed to reimburse him, he cannot defeat recovery in a suit by the factor on the grounds that the transportation charges were excessive.⁵¹

Recoupment or set-off. Where the factor sues for commissions, advances, etc., the principal may recoup or set off whatever damages he has sustained by reason of a breach of duty on the part of the factor,⁵² as by reason of his failure to sell according to instructions;⁵³ or he may recover such damages by an adjustment of his claim in a settlement of accounts without being driven to a cross action.⁵⁴ However, where in the particular case the relation between the parties is that of debtor and creditor, the principal cannot set up a counterclaim after a demand made for the proceeds, on the ground of conversion, in an action by the factor to recover his commissions.⁵⁵

Res judicata. In accordance with the general doctrine of res judicata, a judgment in a prior suit between the principal and factor may be set up in a subsequent action by the factor against the principal, in which the same fact or question is litigated.⁵⁶

c. Pleading; Issues, Proof, and Variance

The general rules of pleading apply to a factor's declaration or complaint and to the principal's plea or answer. The proof must be confined to the issues presented by the pleadings.

In accordance with the general rules of pleading, the declaration or complaint in an action by a factor against his principal must state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.⁵⁷ A complaint for commissions on a sale of goods should allege what amount, if any, was realized by defendant from the sale,⁵⁸ and should also allege a consideration for the factor's contract on which the suit is brought;⁵⁹ and an averment that defendant promised to pay plaintiff reasonable commissions should be followed by a statement of the reasonable value of such commissions.⁶⁰

Where, under the particular practice, a statement of claim is filed, it should be sufficiently specific to enable the principal to plead understandingly and with full knowledge of every claim that can be made or question which can be raised under it at the trial; and in an action to recover a balance of advances made by the factor, the statement of the claim should set out the account between the

In accordance with the general rules of pleading, the plea or answer which seeks to set up a defense to the action must state with certainty the facts relied on,⁶³ and where the factor sues to recover the balance of an account, principally for advances, a plea which sets up a violation of an agreement to sell the goods at a certain price whereby defendant was damaged to a greater amount than the sum sued for is insufficient if it does not state at what time the agreement was made.⁶⁴

- (2) Admissibility
- (3) Weight and sufficiency

(1) Presumptions and Burden of Proof

In an action by a factor against his principal, the burden is on the factor to prove matters in issue which are essential to his cause of action, and the burden to prove matters of affirmative defense is on the principal. Where fraud or bad faith is not alleged, it will be presumed that a sale by the factor was fairly made and for the best price available.

In accordance with the usual rules of evidence, in an action by a factor against his principal the burden is on plaintiff to prove matters in issue which are essential to his cause of action,⁶⁶ and on defendant to prove matters of defense affirmed by him,⁶⁷ unless the subject matter of the defense is peculiarly within the knowledge of plaintiff.⁶⁸ Thus, in action for a balance due, where defendant denies the indebtedness and further alleges that by plaintiff's negligence and want of diligence the property was sold for less than its market value, the burden of proving the price for which the property was sold is on plaintiff as being peculiarly within his knowledge, but the burden of proving plaintiff's negligence and want of diligence is on defendant, unless the circumstances in the case raise a presumption of negligence.⁶⁹

Where no fraud or bad faith is alleged, it will be presumed that the sale by the factor was fairly made and for the best price available at the time.⁷⁰

(2) Admissibility

Evidence is held admissible or inadmissible in accordance with the general rules governing in civil actions.

In an action by a factor against his principal, evidence is held admissible or inadmissible in accordance with the general rules governing the competency, relevancy, and materiality of evidence in civil actions.⁷¹ In an action to recover advances, where the principal counterclaims, setting up a loss which he claims was occasioned by the factor's negligence in failing to sell, evidence of the market price in other localities is inadmissible, where there is no

Proof of conversion under general denial

Where in an action for the balance of an account for goods sold, and for commission on a sale by plaintiff of a carriage for defendant, at his request, the answer is a general denial, evidence that the carriage was sold by plaintiff without authority and against defendant's orders is inadmissible, since the evidence amounts to an offer to prove a conversion of the carriage by plaintiff, not raised by the pleadings. N.Y.—Wood v. Belden, 54 N.Y. 658.

Under plea of payment

In an action by a factor for damages for breach of a contract to fill orders for goods solicited by him, it was held that under a plea of payment, proof and a finding as to the amounts paid plaintiff by defendant on commissions due him under the contract were warranted.

claim that the factor's failure to sell was the result of fraud, for if the factor had transferred the goods to another market, he would have been liable for any depreciation in the price.⁷²

Custom or usage. Evidence may be given to show the customs of merchants so far as they concern the transactions between the parties and the questions at issue between them,⁷³ provided the custom is so general, long established, and notorious that the party against whom it is to operate must be presumed to have knowledge of it,⁷⁴ and is not in contravention of a settled rule of law.⁷⁵

Receipts. Freight bills and receipts are secondary evidence and not admissible without preliminary testimony identifying them or showing their admissibility.⁷⁶ Where the defense to an action for advances is that the transaction was a sale and not a consignment, receipts signed by the bookkeeper of defendant, who was his "business man" and to whom the advances were paid, the receipts being to the effect that money had been received from plaintiff for advances from consignments, are admissible without proof of express authority of the bookkeeper to sign receipts in this form, and it is not competent for defendant to prove by the bookkeeper that he executed the receipts in this form without authority.⁷⁷

(3) Weight and Sufficiency

The usual rules as to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in civil actions are applied in an action by a factor against his principal.

The usual rules as to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in civil actions are applied to the evidence in an action by a factor against his principal,⁷⁸ including evidence introduced on a counterclaim by the principal in an action by the factor.⁷⁹

e. Trial; Judgment

The rules which govern in other civil actions apply, in an action by a factor against his principal, with regard to the determination of questions of law and fact and to the instructions to the jury. The judgment cannot be for a greater amount than that to which plaintiff shows he is entitled.

In accordance with the general rule in civil actions, questions of law are for the court⁸⁰ and questions of fact are for the jury's determination.⁸¹ Where the evidence is undisputed and only one reasonable inference can be drawn therefrom, it is proper for the court to give a peremptory instruction;⁸² but in particular circumstances the direction of a verdict has been held improper.^{82.5}

The rules which govern in other civil actions are applied with regard to the instructions to the jury.⁸³ Thus, an instruction must not be misleading,⁸⁴ it must not ignore material facts in evidence,⁸⁵ it must be applicable to the evidence,⁸⁶ and it must sufficiently submit the parties' contentions to the jury.^{86.5} An instruction is erroneous which authorizes the jury in a suit for advances over and above the realization of consignments to find for plaintiff on a certain hypothesis without regard to whether plaintiff exercised due care and diligence.⁸⁷

Where the parties disagree as to the terms of a special contract for the sale of goods on commission, the fact that the court does not find the contract exactly as claimed by either party but adopts the testimony of each in part does not amount to a finding that there was no meeting of the minds on any definite contract.⁸⁸

A judgment for plaintiff cannot be given for a greater amount than that to which he shows he is entitled.⁸⁹

Damages are discussed supra subdivision a of this section.

IV. RIGHTS, DUTIES, AND LIABILITIES OF FACTOR AND PRINCIPAL AS TO THIRD PERSONS

§ 52. Rights of Factor against Third Persons

The rights of a factor as against third persons are considered with respect to contracts relating to goods infra § 53, and with respect to torts relating to goods infra § 54.

The duties and liabilities of third persons to agents generally are considered in the title Agency §§ 225-230, and the rights of agents to maintain actions against third persons, in § 285 of that title.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 53. — On Contracts Relating to Goods

In general, a factor may maintain an action in his own name against a third person on a contract made by him relating to the goods.

As a general rule, since a factor has, from the nature of his employment, a special property in the goods consigned to him by his principal, he may maintain an action in his own name against a third person either for the breach or the enforcement of a contract made by him relating to the goods,⁹⁰ such as a contract of storage,⁹¹ or, especially where there is an express promise to pay him,⁹² for the recovery of the purchase price of goods sold by him.⁹³ He may maintain such action whether the name of the principal is disclosed or not,⁹⁴ and even though he has accounted to his principal in full for the purchase price,⁹⁵ as in such a case he little demand for cotton such as that in question, that every effort was made to sell it at a fair price, that sales were made at every opportunity, and account sales regularly submitted to shipper, who made no objection, and there was no evidence as to the grade or staple of the cotton, or that it could have been sold at a higher price, it was error to refuse a peremptory instruction requested by plaintiff.

Where goods which have been rejected by a consignee are sold by a third person to accommodate the consignor, such third party, being entitled to a commission merchant's commission, is at least an agent of the consignor with sufficient interest in the proceeds of the sale to entitle him to sue for the proceeds in his own name, particularly where the principal does not object.

may maintain the suit for his own use;⁹⁶ but he cannot sue on a contract which the principal and the purchaser have rescinded.⁹⁷

Since a factor who sells goods in his own name is regarded as trustee of an express trust, see § 1 e supra, he is so regarded within the meaning of statutory provisions that a trustee of an express trust may sue in his own name on the contract without joining with him a person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted.⁹⁸ Where a factor has no lien on, or special interest in, the goods sold, and the purchaser has accounted to the principal therefor, the factor cannot maintain an action against the purchaser for the proceeds of the goods.⁹⁹

Substitution of goods. Where a factor makes a contract of sale, for the benefit of his principal, of goods to arrive within a certain period, he may, as against one who discounts drafts drawn on the goods consigned and to whom the bills of lading are delivered, substitute other goods of the same character in fulfillment of the contract.¹

Lien for purchase money. Under a statute to that effect, a factor, as the seller of goods, has a lien thereon against the purchaser for the purchase money.²

Defenses. A purchaser from a factor who sells in his own name cannot set off a claim against the principal which is not yet payable;³ nor is it a defense to an action by the factor for the price of goods sold that the sale was made by the factor's agent without authority from the principal, as such objection can be raised only by the principal.⁴

§ 54. — For Torts Relating to Goods

A factor may maintain an action in his own name for torts relating to goods in his possession; but under some circumstances his recovery may be limited to the amount of his lien or special property in the goods.

As against a wrongdoer, a factor may maintain an action in his own name for torts relating to the goods in his possession, and may generally recover damages to the full amount of the injuries to the goods,⁵ as where the goods are wrongfully taken or withheld from his possession.⁶

However, where the action is against one claiming through the principal, the factor can recover only the value of his special property in the goods.⁷ Similarly, under a statute giving the owner of abandoned or captured property a right, after it has been sold by the government, to recover the proceeds of it, a factor is not such an owner as to entitle him to maintain an action of trover for the value of the property beyond the extent of his lien;⁸ and under a statute subjecting a city to the payment of damages, occasioned by the destruction of buildings to prevent the spreading of a conflagration, to owners or persons having an estate or interest in the buildings destroyed, a factor who has goods in such a building and has a lien on such goods may claim damages to the amount of his lien,⁹ but is not entitled to claim the value of the goods for the benefit of the owner.¹⁰

A factor who is compelled to pay an illegal exaction in connection with the shipment of goods in his possession may maintain in his own name a suit to recover the amount of the exaction, in a case where the owner might do so;¹¹ and the right to maintain such action does not terminate when he receives his compensation.¹²

§ 55. — Right of Principal to Control Action

A factor's right to maintain an action with respect to the goods is generally subject to the principal's right to

Reason for rule

The duty of a factor to his principal to seek reparation for illegal exactions does not terminate on remission of the proceeds of the sale of the property, but persists with the assent of the principal until the claim is prosecuted to a successful conclusion.

U.S.—Adams v. Mills, supra.

control the litigation or sue in his own name. Authorities differ as to whether a foreign principal has the same right.

The right of a factor to sue for the price of goods or injuries to them is, as a general rule, subject to the right of the principal to control the litigation or to sue in his own name,¹³ except that the principal cannot intervene or sue in such a manner as to defeat the factor's lien.¹⁴ However, the factor may control such litigation where there is nothing to indicate that such control is contrary to the wishes of the principal.¹⁵

Foreign principal. It has been held that, where a factor makes a contract relating to the goods of a principal residing in a foreign country, the presumption arises that exclusive credit was given to the factor and that an action on the contract can be sustained by the factor alone,¹⁶ and not by the principal, except through and by the factor.¹⁷ On the other hand, it has been held that there is no such absolute presumption, and that the principal, whether foreign or domestic, may sue to recover the price of goods sold by his factor,¹⁸ unless it is made affirmatively to appear that exclusive credit was given to the factor by proof other than the mere fact that the principal resided in another state or country;¹⁹ and if the purchaser of a consignment becomes insolvent, the nonresident consignor is not affected by the discharge of the insolvent, but can sue to recover the price for which the goods were sold.²⁰

§ 56. Liability of Factor to Third Person

- a. In general
- b. Liability to purchaser or pledgee
- c. Liability on principal's promise or direction as to proceeds

a. In General

A factor is personally liable on contracts made by him except where he discloses his principal and makes the contract in such form as to bind the principal only. Authorities differ as to whether a factor for a foreign principal is personally liable even though his principal is disclosed.

A factor is personally liable on a contract which he enters into in his own name without disclosing his principal,²¹ even though he is known to be a factor;²² and he cannot avoid such liability by settling with his principal, without the third person's consent.²³ However, where he discloses the fact of his agency and the name of the person for whom he is acting, he is not personally liable if he makes the contract in such form as to be binding on his principal, unless it appears that he also intended to bind himself personally.²⁴

Factor for foreign principal. It was held by some early decisions that by the usage of trade a factor acting for a merchant resident in a foreign country is personally liable for contracts made by him for his principal, notwithstanding he fully discloses, at the time, the character in which he acts.²⁵ This rule has been held not applicable to the case of a principal domiciled in another state of the Union, as the interests of trade do not require it.²⁶ However, it has also been held that where a written contract is made and expressed to be with the foreign principal and not with the factor, the latter is not liable, even though the contract is signed by him for, and on account of, the foreign principal.²⁷

Liability for money paid. Where a factor receives money for his principal, to which the latter is not entitled, he is liable to the party paying it, unless before it is claimed he actually pays it over to the principal, or does something equivalent thereto; a mere entry on the factor's books to the credit of the principal is no answer to the claim of the true owner if the factor has not parted with anything of value.²⁸

b. Liability to Purchaser or Pledgee

A factor selling in his own name and without disclosing his principal incurs all liabilities created by the contract of sale; and he is liable on a warranty made without authority or without disclosing his agency or his principal. A factor is bound by an unauthorized pledge made by him.

28. La.—Weld v. Shaw, 2 La. Ann. 559.

Where a factor sells goods avowedly as factor for a disclosed principal and acts within his authority, he incurs no personal liability to the purchaser;²⁹ but where he sells goods in his own name, without disclosing his principal, he incurs all the liabilities, express or implied, created by the contract of sale, in the same manner as if he were the principal in interest;³⁰ and the same rule applies where the factor discloses the fact of his agency but does not disclose the name of his principal.³¹ Thus, if a factor sells in his own name a consignment of goods which were stolen, he is liable to the purchaser to whom he sells, if the goods are subsequently recovered by the true owner, for the return of the purchase money and the expenses incurred in defending his title.³²

On warranty. Where a factor warrants the goods, without any authority for such warranty from his principal,³³ or where he gives a warranty without designating that he is acting as agent or disclosing the name of his principal,³⁴ he may be held personally liable on the warranty, although he settles with his principal before notice of any breach of warranty, and although, before the property is delivered, the principal informs the purchaser that the property is sold on his account;³⁵ and the mere fact that the purchaser knew the name of the real owner of the goods does not preclude his right to hold the factor liable, where the purchaser intended to give credit to the factor.³⁶ The fact that the factor was dealing with the property of a third person does not affect the right of the purchaser to retain the goods and seek his remedy founded on a breach of warranty instead of returning the

An agent for the sale of goods who secures a subagent to make the actual sale will not be liable, either as undisclosed principal, where the buyer's contract is with the owner,³⁸ or as agent for an undisclosed principal,³⁹ on warranties, of which he was unaware, made by the subagent.

Liability to pledgee. An unauthorized pledge is valid as against the factor, since he is estopped from setting up his own tortious act,⁴⁰ and this rule has also been held to apply to a subsequent purchaser from the factor,⁴¹ although on the latter point there is some authority to the contrary.⁴²

A factor is not liable to a third person for failing to turn over proceeds which he has been directed, or which he knows his principal has promised, to turn over to such third person, unless he has agreed to do so, or has notice of a transfer of control over the proceeds to the third person. These rules apply in determining whether a factor is liable for failure to accept a draft drawn against the consignment in favor of a third person.

In accordance with the doctrine of equitable assignments generally, see Assignments §§ 58-62, a factor is not liable to a third person for failing to turn over the proceeds to him, merely because he has been directed by his principal to do so,⁴³ or because he has notice of a promise by the principal to pay a debt due such third person out of the proceeds;⁴⁴ but he is so bound where he has made an agreement with his principal to do so,⁴⁵ or where he has notice that, by agreement, or by the circumstances of the transaction, there is an appropriation of the proceeds to such third person sufficient to transfer the control over them to him.⁴⁶

Where broker contracted with salmon packers to make advances and act as sales agent, reserving special property in salmon until advances were repaid out of proceeds, and then secured another agent to make actual sales, broker was not liable to buyers, as undisclosed principal, for unfitness of salmon for use, where buyers' contracts were with packers without knowledge of broker's connection with transaction.

Thus, where a factor receives goods consigned to him with notice at the time he receives them that the owner has given to a third person, for money advanced, the right to the funds which may arise from the sale of the goods, the factor cannot divert the funds from the third person without liability to him;⁴⁷ and he cannot receive the funds as if to carry out the will of the consignor and respect the rights of the third person, and subsequently apply the proceeds of the sale to the payment of an account due the factor from the consignor.⁴⁸

Duty to accept draft or bill of exchange. These rules apply in determining whether a factor is liable for failure to accept a draft drawn against the consignment in favor of a third person.⁴⁹ Thus, where a bill of exchange is drawn against a consignment, an indorser cannot claim that the factor is bound to accept or apply the proceeds of the consignment to the payment of the bill, unless a letter accompanying the consignment expressly directs a specific application of the proceeds of the consignment to the payment of the bill;⁵⁰ and even though a specific appropriation has been made, an indorser who had no notice of it and who did not negotiate and indorse the bill on the faith that the proceeds would be applied to its payment has no other rights than those of an ordinary indorser.⁵¹ Similarly, a person who would be indirectly benefited by the factor's acceptance of a draft drawn against the consignment and payable to a bank cannot maintain an action against the factor for his failure to accept the draft.⁵²

Where the principal assigns a bill of lading to a third person who discounts a draft drawn on a particular consignment, and the factor has notice thereof, he cannot apply the proceeds of the consignment to other purposes, for the title to the consignment and the proceeds thereof belong to such third person to the extent of the draft discounted on the security thereof;⁵³ but if a bank discounts a draft and obtains no property in the consignment by the assignment of the bill of lading or by the attachment thereof to the draft or by other means, it cannot enforce the promise of the factor made to the consignor to accept the draft and to pay it, but the factor may apply the proceeds of the consignment to the debt of the principal to him.⁵⁴

§ 57. — For Torts

- a. In general
- b. Conversion

a. In General

A factor, despite his good faith, is liable in tort to the true owner of property which the principal has wrongfully placed with the factor, provided there were defects in the principal's right of possession at that time.

Ordinarily, a factor must rely on his principal's honesty or financial responsibility to protect him in dealing with goods placed in his hands by the principal,⁵⁵ for no matter what innocence and good faith may characterize the factor's acts, he is liable in tort to the true owner or lienor against whom the principal's act of placing the chattels with the factor is a tort.⁵⁶ This liability, however, is limited to cases in which there are defects in the principal's right of possession when he turns the chattels over to the factor;⁵⁷ and if the principal has, in fact, a good title and right of possession when he delivers the chattels to the factor to sell, the factor's possession is lawful, and his authority to sell continues until he has notice of revocation.⁵⁸

Thus, where goods not belonging to his principal come into the hands of a factor, the true owner thereof, although previously unknown to the factor, may require an accounting of him;⁵⁹ and if the factor sells the goods, he is liable to the true owner in an action for money had and received,⁶⁰ and cannot apply such proceeds to a debt due him from the principal.⁶¹ However, where the factor is not benefited by the tort, and pays over the proceeds of the sale without notice of the rights of the real owner, he cannot be held liable in an action on contract.⁶²

b. Conversion

A factor is liable to the true owner for conversion where he receives from his principal property to which his principal has no right, and does not turn over the property or its proceeds to the true owner. Generally, the factor's good faith and ignorance of the true ownership are no defense; but it is a defense that he was misled by the owner, or that the owner consented to the sale.

Quoted in: U.S.—Sullivan Co. v. Wells, D.C.Neb., 39 F. Supp. 317, 319.

A factor is liable to the true owner for conversion where he asserts dominion over the personal property of such owner against his will,⁶³ as where he receives from his principal property to which the latter has no right or title, and sells it and pays over the proceeds to the principal, or refuses to deliver the property or its proceeds to the true owner.⁶⁴

This rule is particularly applicable where the factor had notice of the true ownership before he sold the goods or before he paid over the proceeds,⁶⁵ or where the principal had stolen the goods or obtained them through fraud or forgery.⁶⁶ However, it is no defense to the factor that he acted in good faith throughout the entire transaction and without knowledge or notice that such third person was the real owner of the property,⁶⁷ or that he did not have the custody of the goods at the time the suit was instituted, but had previously, in good faith and without notice of the title of the true owner, sold them in due course of trade,⁶⁸ or that he acted for, or under authority from, another who himself had no authority,⁶⁹ or that a common carrier was guilty of negligence in permitting the property to be diverted from its true destination by means of a forged waybill and placed in the possession of the factor through a forged bill of lading.⁷⁰

Some authorities have held that, where the factor receives goods for sale in good faith, and pays over the proceeds to his principal, who purports to be the true owner, before he has notice of the true owner's rights, and has neither the goods nor the proceeds in his possession when demand is made by the true owner, he cannot be said to have knowingly asserted any claim to the property or its proceeds against the owner and consequently is not guilty of conversion.⁷¹

has been misled through the act of the owner,⁷² or of his agent,⁷³ or where he obtains possession, and sells the goods, with the consent of the owner.⁷⁴

Under Packers and Stockyards Act. Although it has been held that since a marketing agency, licensed under the Federal Packers and Stockyards Act, 7 U.S.C.A. §§ 181 et seq, is prevented from serving any principal, it would not be held personally liable, under strict common-law rules governing factors, for selling cattle to an innocent third party on behalf of a fraudulent buyer who had given the seller a worthless check for the purchase price, and for turning over the third party's money to the fraudulent buyer,^{74.5} the majority of opinions hold that such marketing agencies are not absolved from common-law liability for conversion,^{74.10} and that the Packers and Stockyards Act does not supersede state laws.^{74.15}

§ 58. Rights of Principal against Third Persons

- a. In general
- b. Property wrongfully disposed of

a. In General

On an authorized sale by a factor, the principal is divested of title in the goods; and the principal may validly countermand the consignment only prior to sale.

On a sale by the factor conformably to his authority, the principal is divested of his title in the goods.⁷⁷

If the authority of a factor to sell has not yet been exercised, the owner may countermand the consignment and sell the goods in transitu, and the purchaser's title will be valid.⁷⁸ If, however, the factor sells and delivers the property before notice of the revocation of his authority, the purchaser who has bought bona fide acquires a good title as against a prior purchaser from the consignor without delivery.⁷⁹

The duties and liabilities of third persons to principals of agents generally are considered in the title Agency §§ 275-282.

b. Property Wrongfully Disposed of

Apart from the effect of the factor's acts, a factor's unauthorized or wrongful disposition of property to a third person passes no title and creates no rights as against the principal, except where he ratifies it or is estopped, as where he has clothed the factor with the apparent ownership or authority to dispose of the property. In the case of an unauthorized pledge, the principal may sue the pledgee for conversion, or to recover the property, or, if the pledgee has sold it, for money had and received.

As a general rule, a person who deals with a factor is bound to take notice of the general extent of his powers,⁸⁰ and, apart from the effect of the factors' acts, as discussed infra §§ 64-67, an unauthorized or wrongful sale or other disposition of the property will pass no title and create no rights in the person dealing with the factor, as against the principal,⁸¹ even to the extent of the factor's lien,⁸² especially where the person dealing with the factor knows, or has information sufficient to charge him with notice, that the factor is exceeding his authority,⁸³ or is selling for a wrongful purpose.⁸⁴

Thus in the absence of ratification or estoppel, the principal's title does not pass where the factor delivers the goods in payment of his own antecedent debt, as discussed supra § 10, or pledges them for his own debt, supra § 14, or where the sale is not according to the usages of the trade.⁸⁵ Ignorance of the purchaser that the person selling is a mere factor and has the goods under consignment will not protect him if the sale is itself unauthorized;⁸⁶ but it will protect him against any charge of complicity in a wrongful disposition by the factor of the proceeds of an authorized sale.⁸⁷

The principal, however, will become bound by an unauthorized or wrongful sale or other disposition of the property where, with knowledge of the facts, he ratifies it;⁸⁸ or he may become bound, as against a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, actual or constructive, on the ground of estoppel, where he has clothed the factor with the apparent ownership or authority to dispose of the property,⁸⁹ although the factor exceeds private instructions or limitations on his powers, of which

However, under a statute to that effect, where there is a delivery of cotton by a commission merchant "on cash sale," the title of the principal remains undivested until payment in full of the purchase price, and may be asserted by him even as against a bona fide purchaser from the factor's purchaser.

It has been held, in this connection, that the possession of the goods by the factor is sufficient to warrant the inference that he has full power to contract in relation to its sale,⁹¹ and that a purchaser need not inquire as to the ownership of the goods;⁹² but it has also been held that where an innocent purchaser or pledgee deals with a factor in reliance on the indicia of title afforded by his possession of the goods, supposing him to be the actual owner, he acquires no title to the property where the transfer is unauthorized under the express or implied terms of the principal's instructions.⁹³

Remedies for unauthorized pledge. If the factor wrongfully pledges his principal's goods, the principal may sue the pledgee as for a conversion of the goods;⁹⁴ and such action may be maintained without a previous demand for the goods, if the pledgee had no notice of the factor's lien, but the goods were pledged by the factor as his own,⁹⁵ or if the pledgee has sold the goods.⁹⁶ However, while there is some authority to the contrary,⁹⁷ an innocent pledgee is generally held to have the right to recoup in such action the amount due from the principal to the factor for advances and expenses;⁹⁸ and it has been held that the principal must properly tender this amount before he can sue in conversion,⁹⁹ although it has also been held that where the factor pledges the goods for more than his lien, trover will lie without any tender of his charges and advances either to the factor or to the pledgee.¹

If the pledgee has not disposed of the goods, the principal may sue to recover the goods from him,² without payment of the charges and advances by the factor;³ but if the pledgee executes a replevin bond, he may recoup from the damages recoverable on the bond the amount of charges and advances made by the factor.⁴ If the pledgee has sold the goods, the principal may sue for money had and received.⁵ Under at least one statute, where the factor pledges the goods for advancements, the owner of the goods may redeem them at any time before sale by the pledgee;⁶ and if the pledgee is charged with notice that the factor is not the real owner, he has no right to sell the goods except at public sale as provided by statute.⁷

§ 59. — On Factor's Contracts

The principal may generally enforce rights arising out of the factor's contracts made on his behalf; so, he may sue a purchaser for the purchase price. Where the principal is undisclosed, a purchaser without notice of the agency may assert, in an action by the principal, any defense to which he would be entitled if the action were brought by the factor.

The principal may, as a general rule, sue on, and enforce rights arising out of, contracts entered into by the factor in his behalf,⁸ unless the contract is an express one under seal with the factor, in which case he alone can sue.⁹ Thus, where the factor sells the goods for his principal, the contract is between the purchaser and the principal;¹⁰ and, subject to the right of the factor to be protected to the extent of his lien,¹¹ the principal, as a general rule, may sue to recover the purchase price of the goods sold,¹² even though the sale was made by the factor in his own name without disclosing the principal;¹³ and this rule applies to a sale by a del credere factor.¹⁴

Where, however, a consignee is at liberty, under his contract with the consignor, to sell at any price and receive payment at any time he likes, and is bound, if he sells, to pay the consignor a fixed price, their relation is not that of principal and factor, and the consignor cannot sue the purchaser for the price.¹⁵

Note taken by factor. If, when a factor makes a sale, he takes a note in his own name for the price, the principal is entitled to sue for the price,¹⁶ except where such security is regarded as constituting payment.¹⁷

Where goods of several sold together. A principal may himself recover the purchase price of goods sold on credit although the goods of several principals are sold at the same time to one purchaser, provided the price for which the goods of each principal were sold can be ascertained.¹⁸ However, it has been held that, where goods of the principal and goods of the factor are sold together for a gross sum, the principal cannot sever his claim from the factor's, and sue in his own name, and thus subject the purchaser to a separate suit for the value of the goods belonging to him.¹⁹

Defenses. Where a factor makes a sale in his own name, without disclosing his principal, to a purchaser who has no notice, either actual or constructive, that the factor is selling as an agent, the purchaser, if an action is brought against him by the principal to recover the purchase price, may avail himself of every defense to which he would be entitled if the action were brought by the factor;²⁰ and, although there are decisions to the contrary,²¹ it is generally held that if the purchaser dealt in good faith with the factor as owner, he may set off any debt or claim he may have against the factor in answer to the demand of the principal.²²

Where, however, the purchaser knows, or has reason to believe, at the time of the sale that the factor is selling the goods as agent, although he does not know or have the means of knowing who is the principal, he has no right to set off, in an action by the principal for the price of the goods, a debt or claim which he holds against the factor.²³ The mere fact that the factor is in the commission business is not notice to the purchaser that he is selling the goods as factor, where he is in the habit of selling goods of his own as well as those of his principal,²⁴ and if the purchaser knows at the time of the sale that the factor is in the habit of selling sometimes as factor and sometimes as principal, and he purchases with a view of covering his own debt and availing himself of a set-off, he is bound to inquire in what character the factor is acting in the particular sale.²⁵

Since the factor's lien is a personal privilege, as discussed supra § 45, it cannot be set up by any other person in defense to an action by the principal.²⁶

§ 60. — Right to Follow Property and Proceeds in General

Apart from statutes protecting persons dealing with factors, where a factor wrongfully disposes of the goods or proceeds the principal may follow and recover them wherever they may be traced, except from a bona fide purchaser for value without notice.

nish protection to persons dealing with factors,²⁸ if the factor wrongfully disposes of the goods or proceeds, the principal may follow and recover them, wherever he can trace them as distinct from those of the factor, into whosoever hands they may come,²⁹ except a bona fide purchaser for value without notice.³⁰ He is entitled to recover the specific goods themselves if they can be had,³¹ and if the goods themselves cannot be recovered, but can be traced, he may recover their proceeds.³²

Thus, except where there is a ratification or estoppel,³³ the principal may follow and reclaim the property or its proceeds from a person to whom the factor has bartered the property in a manner not authorized by the principal and not within the ordinary modes of transacting business,³⁴ or from a person to whom the factor has turned over the property or its proceeds in payment of an antecedent debt due from the factor.³⁵

Where the contract between the principal and factor creates an express trust, the principal cannot rely on such contract with respect to goods as to which the trust feature has been abandoned.³⁶

As against subagent. It has been held that the doctrine of following trust funds is applicable in favor of a principal against the subagent of his factor, where the subagent claims the proceeds of goods sold for a balance due from the factor to him.³⁷ It has been held that a correspondent and agent who, under contract with the consignee and for a consideration moving from the consignee, discounts bills drawn by the shipper on the consignee, cannot, as against the shipper, claim the surplus of the proceeds remaining after deducting all the advances made on the goods.³⁸

§ 61. — Insolvency or Death of Factor

Where a factor becomes insolvent, or dies, title to the property of the principal, or the proceeds thereof, remains with the principal, who may reclaim the property or the proceeds, provided they are distinguishable from the rest of the estate; if they are not, or if the funds received by the factor have been used by him, the principal shares with other creditors in the distribution of the factor's estate.

for advances or commissions;³⁹ his assignee or receiver merely succeeds to his rights, and is under the same obligation to restore to the consignor the proceeds of his goods, which are distinguishable, as the factor himself was.⁴⁰ The goods remaining in the factor's hands and the proceeds of such as have been sold are, with the exception of the value of the factor's lien, the property of the consignor and subject to his order, and if the consignor can trace them he may follow and reclaim them from the factor or the factor's receiver or assignee for the benefit of his creditors;⁴¹ and this rule applies even though the factor is acting under a del credere commission,⁴² except that, if the factor fails after having made advances in the form of notes or acceptances, his assignee is entitled to retain amounts arising from the sale of goods until the notes or acceptances are surrendered or destroyed.⁴³

However, if the funds received by the factor have been used by him or are incapable of identification, the principal only shares in the distribution of the factor's estate as any other creditor.⁴⁴ So, if the assignee, without notice of the principal's claim, makes a bona fide sale of the goods and distributes the proceeds, he is not responsible to the principal therefor.⁴⁵

Death of factor. In case of the death of the factor, no title to the property unsold or the debts due for property sold on credit passes to his personal representative as against the principal.⁴⁶

§ 62. — For Injury to or Loss of Goods

The principal may generally sue in his own name for torts of third persons which cause injury to, or loss of, his goods; but the factor's recovery of judgment for injury to goods which are in his possession and on which he has a lien bars an action by the principal for such injury.

Although a factor has accepted and paid drafts drawn on him by the principal to an amount equal to or exceeding the value of the goods,⁴⁷ the principal may, as a general rule, sue in his own name for torts of third persons which cause an injury to, or loss of, his goods,⁴⁸ such as conversion, as where a third person, with full knowledge of the principal's title and the factor's relation to the goods, receives them from the factor in payment of the latter's private debt.⁴⁹ The principal may maintain an action against a sheriff or other officer for wrongfully taking the goods from the possession of the factor,⁵⁰ or for taking the goods, or the proceeds of a sale thereof, on an attachment against the factor.⁵¹ However, the recovery by the factor of a judgment for injury to goods which are in his possession and on which he has a lien is a bar to an action by the principal for such injury.⁵²

§ 63. Liability of Principal to Third Person

In general, the principal is liable for acts of the factor which are within the scope of the agency or which the principal has ratified; and on a proper sale by the factor, title in the goods passes to the purchaser. While property held by the factor is subject to attachment for the principal's debts, it is not, in the absence of statute or estoppel of the principal, subject to attachment or execution for the factor's debts.

The principal is bound by, and is liable for, the acts of a factor which are within the scope of the agency,⁵³ or are subsequently ratified by the principal,⁵⁴ except that the principal is not liable on a contract made by the factor where the person dealing with the factor gives exclusive credit to him.⁵⁵

Subsequent sale by owner

Where the owner delivered an automobile to a factor for sale, the owner cannot, after the factor has sold it to a third person, lawfully retake it and sell it to his own vendee, for while a sale by the factor without delivery of possession would, under the statute defining fraudulent transfer, be deemed fraudulent on sale to another with delivery of possession, and the last purchaser would be entitled to the car, that principle does not apply to the owner.

Where third person makes advances to owner of goods, and receives from him a bill of sale of such goods under an agreement that if a draft drawn to reimburse such person for his advances is not duly paid, he may consign the goods to a factor for

Title passing to purchaser. On a sale by the factor conformably to his authority, the title in the goods passes to the purchaser;⁵⁶ and the mere fact that the factor intends to appropriate, or subsequently does appropriate, the proceeds of the sale to his own use does not prevent the purchaser from acquiring a good title.⁵⁷ A bona fide sale by a factor of the goods of his principal for a valuable consideration by assigning over the bill of lading is valid as against the principal if the factor has the bill of lading in his possession,⁵⁸ even though the goods had not at the time of the transfer of the bill of lading come into the factor's hands.⁵⁹

Rights of creditors. The principal's property in the hands of his factor is subject to attachment for debts of the principal;⁶⁰ but in the absence of statute or estoppel against the principal, it is not subject to attachment or execution for debts of the factor,⁶¹ and the principal's right to stop the goods in transitu is ordinarily superior to the claims of the factor's creditors on the goods,⁶² unless the principal has parted with his property in the goods.⁶³ The fact that on attachment factors of defendant certify that they have no goods belonging to him does not affect the rights of other creditors who, before the certificate was given, had acquired an equitable right to have any such goods applied to pay acceptances of defendant held by them, even though the factor is deemed to have lost his lien by making the certificate.⁶⁴

§ 64. Protection of Third Persons under Factors' Acts

- a. In general
- b. Property and documents within statutes

a. In General

Under the various factors' acts, possession of property or documents of title by a factor, as apparent owner, will protect a bona fide purchaser or pledgee as against the real owner; under some acts the owner or principal can reclaim his property on repayment of the sum with which the innocent party parted. Such acts have no retrospective or extraterritorial effect; authorities disagree as to whether they should be strictly or liberally construed.

In a number of jurisdictions, under statutes providing to that effect and known as factors' acts, it is the rule that possession of property or documents of title by a factor or agent, as apparent owner, is conclusive evidence that the factor or agent is the owner, so far as is necessary to protect a bona fide purchaser or pledgee as against the real owner.⁶⁵ sale, and, the draft not being paid, the goods are consigned to the factor named and are sold for less than the amount due for advances, such third person's right of recovery against the owner does not depend on whether or not the owner has a remedy against the factor for any unfaithfulness on his part.

Purpose of factors' acts

(1) The purpose of this remedial legislation is to protect third persons who in good faith deal with factors or agents intrusted by the owners with the possession of the goods or with the documentary evidence of title thereto.

N.Y.—People v. Rosenfeld, 83 N.Y.S. 2d 691, 193 Misc. 277—G. Dewey Sullivan, Inc. v. H. Stern, Inc., 265 N.Y.S. 481, 148 Misc. 235.

25 C.J. p 420 note 96.

(2) The purpose is to protect a bona fide purchaser where the agent has exceeded his authority.

Mass.—Associates Discount Corporation v. C. E. Fay Co., 30 N.E.2d 876, 307 Mass. 577, 132 A.L.R. 519.

(3) Factors' acts were designed to remedy the hardship imposed by the common law on innocent third persons dealing with factors.

U.S.—Foerderer v. Tradesmen's Nat. Bank, N.Y., 107 F. 219, 46 C.C.A. 243.

(4) Common-law rule as to property wrongfully disposed of by factor see supra § 58.

The theory of factors' act, providing that agent intrusted by principal with possession of merchandise for purpose of sale or as security for advances thereon shall be deemed true owner thereof so far as to validate his contract for sale of merchandise, is that principal's selection of faithless agent is cause of loss to innocent third party, so that loss is placed on principal.

However, under some statutes, the title acquired by one dealing with a factor or agent who goes outside the scope of his specific authority is a qualified or limited title;⁶⁶ that is, while the purchaser or pledgee in good faith has valid title as against others,⁶⁷ the true owner or principal has the right to reclaim his property on payment of the sum with which the innocent party parted.⁶⁸

In so far as these statutes have not changed the law, and in cases to which the statutes do not apply, the common-law rule prevails,⁶⁹ as where the factor or agent attempts to pledge or transfer goods of his principal by the transfer of any document of title not within the act.⁷⁰

Construction and operation. The terms used in a factors' act have legalistic implications and are not to be taken in their ordinary meanings.⁷¹ It has been held that the factors' acts, being in derogation of the common law, should be strictly construed;⁷² but other authority holds that, since these statutes enact the common-law rule that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer loss from the act of a third person, such loss must be borne by him who has placed the third person in the position which enables him to do the act causing the loss, they must be liberally construed.⁷³

The rule of ejusdem generis has been applied in construing such an act.⁷⁴

The factors' acts have no retrospective effect, but apply solely to transactions by factors or agents after the enactment thereof;⁷⁵ and they have no extraterritorial effect, but apply only to transactions by factors or agents within the jurisdiction where-in they are enacted.⁷⁶

Repeal. A factors' act containing a provision which conflicts with a provision of a subsequent act is repealed by implication to the extent of the inconsistency.⁷⁷

b. Property and Documents within Statutes

Generally, all commodities of commerce are included within the operation of factors' acts. What are documents of title, within the meaning of the acts, depends on the terms of the particular statutes.

The word "goods" or "merchandise," as used in factors' acts, generally include all commodities of commerce;⁷⁸ but doubt has been expressed as to whether an incorporeal right, such as a copyright, is "merchandise" within the meaning of this statute.⁷⁹

Documents of title. What are documents of title within the meaning of factors' acts depends primarily on the language of the particular statutes,⁸⁰ and to render valid a contract made on the faith of the document of title the terms of the document must be consistent with the supposition that the factor owns the goods.⁸¹ A factor or agent may be

Estoppel of owner

It is the act of the owner in conferring on his factor the apparent ownership and the right of disposal, together with the fact that an innocent third person has dealt with the latter in reliance thereon, that estops the former from following his property.

regarded as the owner, within the meaning of the statute, where he is intrusted with the possession of a bill of lading⁸² drawn or indorsed to his name,⁸³ a custom-house permit,⁸⁴ or the receipt of a private warehouse,⁸⁵ although not of a bonded one.⁸⁶

The term "document of title," or an equivalent term, does not, however, include a weigher's return,⁸⁷ a delivery order,⁸⁸ a telegram from the shipper,⁸⁹ a manifest indicating the size of the shipment,⁹⁰ a consular invoice,^{90.5} or the certificate of registration of an automobile, at least where it has not been indorsed as required by statute to effect a transfer.⁹¹

§ 65. — Factors or Agents within Statutes

In order that the protection of the factors' acts may be invoked for one receiving property, the person improperly disposing of the property must have been the agent or factor of the owner.

In order that an unauthorized disposition of goods by a person other than the owner may be brought within the effect of the factors' acts, it is necessary that the relation of principal and agent or factor exist between such person and the owner of the goods;⁹² and if this relation in fact exists, the statute operates even though the parties call their relation by a different name.⁹³ While it has been held that the term "agent or factor," as used in the statutes, is to be taken in a restricted sense, and applies only to an agent or factor acting in mercantile transactions,⁹⁴ it has also been held that anyone who is intrusted with possession, or with the lawful evidence of title to property, to enable him to sell it, becomes an agent within the meaning of the act.⁹⁵

The statute does not apply to a mere servant or clerk,⁹⁶ a caretaker,⁹⁷ the manager of a store carried on in the owner's name,⁹⁸ or one who has possession of the goods for carriage,⁹⁹ or otherwise as an independent contracting party.¹

§ 66. — Character and Sufficiency of Factor's or Agent's Possession of Goods or Evidence of Title

A factor's possession of goods, to come within the factors' acts, must be actual and not merely constructive; and possession of the goods or of documents of title must have been acquired with the consent of the owner and without fraud. In some jurisdictions, the factor must have been intrusted with the goods for the purpose of sale or as security for advances to be made or obtained thereon.

Where the possession of goods or merchandise, as distinguished from the possession of documentary evidence of title, is relied on to bring the case within a statute providing for the protection of persons dealing with a factor or agent intrusted with the possession of goods or merchandise, the possession must be actual and not merely constructive.² However, it has been held that the factor's possession is sufficient if he has such control of, or dominion over, the merchandise as to enable him rightfully to take possession of it without the aid of any new authority or document furnished by the owner.³ Goods in a warehouse subject to being withdrawn at pleasure by a factor on discharging the lien of the government for duties may be regarded as in his possession so as to support a pledge thereof made by him independently of the provisions of the act in regard to documentary evidences of title.⁴

Consent of owner. Whatever the character of the possession, whether of the goods or of the documents of title, it is essential that it be acquired with the consent of the owner,⁵ and that such consent be obtained without fraud.⁶ Possession acquired through negligence on the part of the owner is not sufficient, since negligence is not consent.⁷

While there is contradictory authority,⁸ it has been held not necessary that the principal should have intrusted the factor with the identical document of title on the faith of which he procures a lien, since intrusting him with the primary document is equivalent to intrusting him with all others which in ordinary usage of trade grow out of it.⁹

Purpose of possession. In some jurisdictions, where the possession of the goods is relied on to bring the transaction within the statute, the factor must not only be intrusted with the possession of the goods, but must be intrusted with their possession for the purpose of sale or as security for any advances to be made or obtained thereon;¹⁰ and, even though a factor obtained a customer for goods before they were consigned to him, he receives the goods for the purpose of making a transfer, within the meaning of this requirement.¹¹ A factor not authorized to sell does not, by paying freight, storage, and insurance premiums, acquire possession of the goods as security for advances, so as to be deemed the true owner within the factors' act.¹²

prehends a factor intrusted with the possession for transportation or storage only.¹³

Loss of possession. Where the agent or factor accomplishes the purpose for which the goods or documents were intrusted to him, and parts with the possession in doing so, he does not, by afterward regaining possession, become intrusted with possession, within the meaning of the statutes.¹⁴

§ 67. — Persons Protected by Statutes

In general, factors' acts protect only those who in good faith, and in ignorance of any defect of title, purchase or make advances on goods or merchandise, on the faith of the apparent ownership thereof by the factor or agent. A valuable consideration other than an antecedent debt must generally be given for the sale or pledge.

As a general rule, factors' acts protect one who, in good faith, and in ignorance of any defect of title, purchases goods or merchandise, or makes advances thereon, on the faith of the apparent ownership thereof by a factor or agent who has been intrusted by the owner with the possession of the goods or merchandise or with the documents of title thereto,¹⁵ provided the purchaser or pledgee is induced so to act on the faith of the ownership being in the factor or agent.¹⁶ On the other hand, the purchaser or pledgee is not entitled to the protection of the statute where the factor or agent had neither possession of, nor documentary evidence of title to, the goods;¹⁷ or where the person who receives the goods from, or makes advances to, an agent or factor had notice, actual or constructive, of the true ownership and want of authority on the part of the agent or factor;¹⁸ or where the protection of the statute would secure to a wrongdoer the fruits of a fraud, as where the goods or documents of title thereto were obtained from the owner by the factor or agent through fraud.¹⁹ The statute has also been held not to apply where the consignor accuses the consignee of misappropriating the consignor's property.^{19.5}

In some jurisdictions a person dealing with the factor is not deprived of the protection of the statute because of the fact that he knows the factor to be only an agent, if he acts bona fide and without notice that the factor is acting mala fide and beyond his authority;²⁰ but mere notice that the factor or agent holds the goods as such has been held sufficient to take the case out of the protection of the acts.²¹ A mere suspicion that the factor or agent is not the owner of the goods is not sufficient to put a person dealing with him on inquiry, and charge him with whatever knowledge such inquiry would have elicited.²²

Purchaser for value. To enable a person to claim the protection of the factors' acts, it is generally necessary that a valuable consideration should be given for the sale or pledge;²³ and it has been held that a person is not within the protection of the statutes where he receives the goods or document of title in payment of, or as security for, an antecedent debt of the factor or agent,²⁴ except where

Where an automobile distributor delivered an automobile to a retail dealer, with knowledge that a finance company had legal title, and later induced the dealer to exchange the automobile for another, notice to the distributor of circumstances which, if investigated, might have disclosed want of authority in the dealer to exchange or barter the automobile was not inconsistent with good faith or with a bona fide contract, since the statutory test is good faith, and not reason to believe in the existence of authority or want of notice under principles of equity.

Interest of agent acquired

By express provision of factors' act, one taking merchandise from a factor or agent in security for an antecedent debt of such agent ac-

such provision of the statute is repealed by implication because of inconsistency with some subsequent statute.²⁵

While it has been held that a person is not protected where he receives the goods through a barter by the factor for his own use,²⁶ it has also been held that an exchange or barter is within the statute;²⁷ and a contract of sale by a factor intrusted with goods for the purpose of sale is valid, although no money or obligation is given at the time of the contract, if an obligation is sufficiently entered into on the faith of the contract at any time while it remains unrescinded.²⁸

Transaction in ordinary course of business. Under some statutes it is necessary, in order to entitle one who deals with the factor or agent to the protection of a factors' act, that the sale or pledge for which he claims protection be transacted by such factor or agent in the usual and ordinary course of business.²⁹

Junior claimants have been held not protected by a factors' act, since that act inures only to the benefit of those acquiring valid liens on specific security.³⁰

§ 68. Actions by or against Principals or Factors

The form of action which should be instituted as between a principal or factor and a third person depends on the circumstances of the case and the nature of the relief sought. Rules governing proceedings in civil actions generally have been applied in such actions with respect to pleading, evidence, and trial.

Where the principal's property is wrongfully sold or pledged, the principal may sue the purchaser in assumpsit for the purchase price,³¹ or may sue him in trover for the value of the property,³² or may maintain replevin to recover the property;³³ and, if the pledgee has sold the goods, the principal, instead of suing in trover, may maintain assumpsit against the pledgee for money had and received.³⁴

In accordance with the rule that a factor may, in his own name, sue a wrongdoer for torts relating to the goods in his possession, as discussed supra § 54, a factor may, in his own name, sue a third person in trover for a conversion of the goods,³⁵ or in replevin for their recovery when they are wrongfully taken from his possession.³⁶

A factor is liable in trover to the real owner of goods where he sells them and fails or refuses to turn over the proceeds.³⁷ An action against a factor to recover the proceeds of a consignment, brought by a third person claiming as owner of the goods, is a legal, and not an equitable, action.³⁸

Pleading. General rules of pleading have been applied in an action by the principal or factor against a third person, or by a third person against the principal or factor.³⁹ Where, in answering a bill by a principal's assignee against the factor for quires no right or interest in the property other than such agent had, and so none where the agent had none.

Substitution of property pledged

(1) Where a factor made a valid pledge of certain goods, his subsequent substitution of other goods does not operate as a pledge for an antecedent debt, since the release of the goods previously pledged constitutes valuable consideration for the subsequent pledge.

Mass.—Osgood Bradley Car Co. v. Standard Steel Motor Car Co., 156 N.E. 440, 259 Mass. 302.

(2) With regard to whether certain cars had been released from pledge by the subsequent pledge of a number of cars, including those originally pledged, it was held that the subsequent pledge was not a substitution of goods pledged, but was rather an additional pledge.

27. "Sale" as including exchange

Although, at common law, authority to sell does not include authority to exchange or barter, in statutes the word "sale" is commonly construed as including exchange or barter, and this is the construction given it in the factors' act relating to the validity of contracts of sale.

FADERFIUM. In old English law, a marriage gift coming from the father or brother of the bride.²⁸

FADE THE GAME. As used in crap shooting see Gaming § 1 b (3).

FADIGA. In Spanish feudal law, the lord's prior right of purchase whenever the fief is offered for sale.²⁹

FADING. As a term used with reference to radio reception see Telegraphs, Telephones, Radio, and Television § 293.

FÆDER-FEOH. In old English law, the portion brought by a wife to her husband, and which reverted to a widow, in case the heir of her deceased husband refused his consent to her second marriage; that is, it reverted to her family in case she returned to them.³⁰

FÆSTING-MEN. Approved men who were strong-armed; "habentes homines" or rich men, men of substance; pledges or bondsmen, who, by Saxon custom, were bound to answer for each other's good behavior.³¹

FAGGOT or FAGOT. In the days before the Reformation, an embroidered badge, in the form of a fagot of firewood, worn by persons who had recanted and abjured what was then adjudged to be heresy, as an emblem of what they had merited;³² also, a term applied to votes manufactured by nominally transferring land to persons otherwise not qualified to vote for members of parliament.³³

FAIDA. In Saxon law, malice, open and deadly hostility, deadly feud.³⁴

FAIL. The word "fail" is defined as meaning to become or be found deficient or wanting;³⁵ to be wanting;^{35.5} to be wanting in action;^{35.10} to be affected with want;^{35.15} to come short of;^{35.20} to be or become deficient in any measure or degree;^{35.25} to fall short;^{35.30} to lack;^{35.35} to prove ineffective or inoperative.^{35.40}

"Fail" is further defined as meaning to keep or cease from an appointed, proper, expected, or required action;³⁶ to leave unperformed, to neglect, or omit;³⁷ and also to make an unavailing effort to succeed.³⁸

Where the word is used in connection with the performance of a duty for which a penalty or liability is imposed, it necessarily implies a notice in some reasonable form, as a prior act or condition by which the one failing shall have become aware of the duty;³⁹ it conveys the idea of fault, negligence, or refusal,⁴⁰ or, in some cases, neglect or default, requiring opportunity to act,⁴¹ and covers both the intentional and unintentional nonperformance of the duty imposed.⁴²

In a different sense "fail" means to become weaker, to grow faint, to sink;⁴³ hence to decline.⁴⁴

means abandonment or defeat;⁵⁷ a cessation or deficiency of supply; a partial or total deficiency in action, etc.,⁵⁸ the result of action which predicates earnest effort, and not mere inaction and refusal to do.⁵⁹ The term connotes an attempt, an effort, a trial,⁶⁰ and presupposes an effort that has proved fruitless.⁶¹

The word "failure" is defined as meaning a default;^{61.5} an omission to perform a duty or appointed function;^{61.10} and it is sometimes used in the sense of nonperformance of a duty, that is, as the equivalent of "neglect,"⁶² and covers both intentional and unintentional nonperformance.⁶³

It may or may not be employed as synonymous with "refusal,"⁶⁴ and it has been held to be synonymous with "lapse"⁶⁵ and "want,"⁶⁶ although in a particular connection it has been said that "failure" is of broader significance than "want."⁶⁷

As used in a mechanics' lien statute relating to the failure to name the owner against whom the lien is claimed see Mechanics' Liens § 162 a (4).

Commercial use. As applied to a merchant or mercantile concern, "failure" has been employed as meaning an inability of a debtor to pay his debts, as a result of insolvency;⁶⁸ a discontinuation of business from insolvency, bankruptcy, or the like, such as ordinarily would result from prior conditions and have a natural tendency to prove prior failing circumstances;⁶⁹ insolvency;⁷⁰ the situation of a debtor who cannot pay his debts;⁷¹ a suspension of payment or an enforced suspension of business.⁷²

In this sense, "failure" is usually accompanied by, or is the result of, insolvency; but it does not necessarily import insolvency conclusively;⁷³ and is not always synonymous with "insolvency."⁷⁴

Phrases employing the word are set out in the note.⁷⁵ Other phrases as to which more recent ad-

As exhibition of industrial products

At the present time the term is very generally used to designate an exposition where the industrial products of a people are exhibited as a display of the success, workmanship, and art of the exhibitors, and to obtain such premiums as may be paid by the owners of the fair as a reward of excellence.

Ohio.—State v. Long, 28 N.E. 1038, 1039, 48 Ohio St. 509.

"Fair" has been distinguished from "market."⁸¹

As an Adjective

It has been said that the word "fair" is a vague and ambiguous term.^{81.5} In common usage it conveys some idea of justice or equity,⁸² and connotes means reasonably adapted to an exigency.⁸³ It has been defined as meaning impartial; free from suspicion of bias;⁸⁴ honest or free from suspicion;⁸⁵ equitable;⁸⁶ equitable as a basis of exchange; a fair value;⁸⁷ reasonable;⁸⁸ honest; upright;⁸⁹ honest, as distinguished from average or middling.⁹⁰

As applied to the weather, free from clouds; not obscure.⁹¹

The term has been held equivalent to, or synonymous with, "clear,"⁹² "equitable," "honest," "impartial,"⁹³ "just,"^{93.5} and "reasonable."⁹⁴

Fair hearing. One in which authority is fairly exercised, that is, consistently with the fundamental principles of justice embraced within the conception of due process of law.⁹⁵ The requirements of a fair hearing are dependent on the nature and purpose of the hearing itself.^{95.5}

The term implies a tribunal free from bias and prejudice,⁹⁶ but a hearing may in fact be unfair without any intention that it shall be so.⁹⁷

To constitute a fair hearing it is not necessary that the procedure followed conform strictly to the formalities of a court action,^{97.5} and it is not necessary that the strict judicial rules of evidence be followed.^{97.10}

Specifically, the term implies that a party concerned shall not only have an opportunity to present evidence in his favor, but also that he shall be apprised of the evidence against him, so that at the conclusion of the hearing he may be in a position to know all the evidence on which the matter is to be decided,⁹⁸ also that he shall have a right to present his argument on the evidence to the tribunal,⁹⁹ and the assistance of counsel has been held a fundamental requisite of "fair hearing."¹

Fair market price. The resultant of the two opposing views of a willing seller and a willing purchaser, the former of whom is not compelled to sell and the latter of whom is not required to buy.⁵ Ordinarily the term implies the existence of a market created by buyers willing to buy and sellers willing to sell,⁶ but in a particular situation it may apply to a price fixed by the manufacturer.⁷

The term has been held to be ordinarily equivalent to, or synonymous with, "actual cash value,"⁸ "clear market price" see the C.J.S. definition Clear, and "market value."⁹

Fair market value. It has been said that an examination of the texts and judicial utterances reveals the fact that the expression "fair market value" has no invariable definition, but that its meaning varies with the circumstances surrounding a given object and situation to which it is sought to apply the term.^{9,5} It also has been said that a statement contained in the Corpus Juris Secundum definition of the term "market price" is equally applicable to the term "fair market value."^{9,10} "Fair market value" implies full knowledge of all the circumstances,^{9,15} and the term is not construed to mean the selling price of property at a forced or involuntary sale,^{9,20} and is neither the highest nor the lowest possible price at which a commodity under exceptional circumstances may be sold, for neither a forced sale nor a compulsory purchase affords the true test of such value.^{9,25} In essence, "fair market value" is market value fairly determined.^{9,30}

Fair market value is the fair, economic, just, and equitable value under normal conditions;¹⁰ the price brought at a fair sale between parties dealing on equal terms;¹¹ the price that would induce a willing business man could presently obtain from the property after conferring with those accustomed to buy such property.¹⁵

"Fair market value" has been said to involve the ascertainment of price which intelligent and reasonable buyers and sellers, having due regard for their mercenary interests, would have most likely agreed on, recognizing facts in evidence or in reasonable contemplation;¹⁶ it has been held to imply the existence of a market where the property may be exchanged for cash in an amount fairly close to its actual value,¹⁷ changeable value,¹⁸ a willing buyer and a willing seller,¹⁹ as well as an agreement between them on the price.²⁰ It has been held not to imply the existence of regular market reports.²¹

The term has been held equivalent to, or synonymous with, "actual cash value,"²² and such terms as "cash market value" and "cash value" treated in the C.J.S. definition Cash, the term "clear market value" treated in the C.J.S. definition Clear. "Fair market value" has also been held to be equivalent to, or synonymous with, "fair cash market value,"²³ "fair value,"²⁴ "market value,"²⁵ "value,"²⁶ and "value in money."²⁷

"Fair market value" has been distinguished from "auction value," "panic value," "speculative value," and "value fixed by depressed or inflated prices;"²⁸ and it has been held that "market price"^{28.5} and "trade-in value"^{28.10} are not necessarily synonymous with "fair market value."

Fair valuation. When applied to property generally, it has been defined as the fair cash value or fair market value of the property as between one who wants to purchase and one who wants to sell the property;²⁹ the present market value;³⁰ such

Use in appraising the value of property

"Traditionally, courts and lawyers for many years regarded market price as the best, almost the conclusive, test of value. At times, where actual market prices were seen to be unreliable, hypothetical willing sellers and willing buyers have been conceived, and the supposed prices at which they would buy and sell have been called a 'fair' market value. There is, however, a noticeable present tendency not to be bound by instant market prices, but to look into the future, to a proper extent, in appraising the value of property."

Presumptions as based on faith

"The basic principle upon which presumptions are built is philosophically related to the doctrine of intent; sincerity; state of knowledge or design;⁶³ recognition of the obligations of morals and honor.⁶⁴ It has been said that the term does not mean necessarily a religious denomination.⁶⁵

In Scotch law, a solemn pledge, an oath.⁶⁶

Good faith. These two words, or their Latin equivalent, appear frequently in the law,⁶⁷ constituting a general term with a somewhat elastic meaning,⁶⁸ and described as a symbolic expression denoting the exercise of reasonable care, prudence, and diligence.⁶⁹

While it has been said on the one hand that good faith is an intangible and abstract quality,^{69.5} it also has been stated that good faith is not an abstract quality or thing,^{69.10} but is a concrete principle,^{69.15} a concrete quality descriptive of the motivating purpose of one's act or conduct when challenged or called in question.^{69.20}

It has been said that the phrase has no technical or refined signification,⁷⁰ and that there is no statutory definition of the term.^{70.5} However, in common usage, it has a well-defined and generally understood meaning,⁷¹ being ordinarily used to describe that state of mind denoting honesty of purpose, freedom from intention to defraud,⁷² and, generally speaking, means being faithful to one's duty or obligation.⁷³ It is borrowed from equity faith. Now faith, says Paul, is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. [Heb. ii: 1, q. v.] 'Presumption,' says Matthews (1 Mat. Presm. Ev. 1) 'is a principle of law, by which, for the furtherance and support of right, facts not established by positive evidence are inferred from circumstances.' That is, where the thing itself is unseen and unknown, in a close sense, it may yet be deemed seen and known in the light of the knowledge of mankind based on frequent occurrence, and found from experience to be generally accordant with truth." honest endeavor, something more than mere honesty of purpose, and that it imports a reasonable expectation of achieving the end sought.⁸⁹

Although in its original and popular sense the term denotes honesty of purpose, absence of bad faith,⁹⁰ and has been said to be more than a state of mind,^{90.5} yet it is popularly used to denote the actual existing state of the mind, without regard to what it should be from given standards of law and reason.⁹¹

It does not always require sound judgment and business sagacity,⁹² but it does imply the exercise of a reasonable discretion in the circumstances,⁹³ and does require the exercise of reasonable diligence to learn the truth,^{93.5} and an honest effort to ascertain the facts, and an honest determination from such ascertained facts.⁹⁴

Good faith encompasses, among other things, an honest belief, the absence of malice, and the absence of a design to defraud or to seek an unconscionable advantage.^{94.5}

The term is used in law to qualify many different kinds of actions;⁹⁵ embracing those obligations which are imposed upon one in dealing with property by the circumstances attending it at the time,⁹⁶ as, for example, between persons standing in confidential or fiduciary relations.⁹⁷

"Good faith" has been held to be synonymous with

More than absence of fraud

To constitute "good faith" there must be an absence not only of participation in the fraud or collusion but also of knowledge or notice of the fraud or of facts and circumstances calculated to put an ordinarily prudent business man on inquiry to ascertain the truth.

In good faith. By prefixing the preposition "in" the term "good faith" forms an adverbial phrase which in law has a settled and well-defined meaning;⁹⁸ actually; honestly;⁹⁹ in an attitude of trust and confidence; innocently; in the absence of all information or belief of facts that would render the transaction unconscientious;¹ really; without fraud, collusion, or deceit; without pretense.²

The phrase connotes a state of mind characterized by honesty of purpose, freedom from intention to be unfair, and the absence of known or readily discoverable facts which would lead to further inquiry,^{2,5} and imports that in any given case the transaction involved was honestly conceived and consummated without collusion, fraud, or knowledge of fraud, and without intent to assist in a fraudulent or otherwise unlawful design.³

The term has been held equivalent to, or convertible or synonymous with, "honest belief" see the C.J.S. definition Belief, "true,"⁴ and "without notice."⁵

It has been distinguished from "willful"⁶ and "willfully."⁷

History

It was enacted by the people during the reign of Augustus, in the Roman year 714, on the proposition of the tribune Falcidius. By this law the testator's right to burden his estate with legacies was subjected to an important restriction. It prescribed that no one could bequeath more than three fourths of his property in legacies, and that the heir should have at least one fourth of the estate, and that, should the testator violate this prescript, the heir might have the right to make a proportional deduction from each legatee, so far as necessary. Black L.D.

In the United States

A similar principle exists in Louisiana. In some of the states the statutes authorizing bequests and devises to charitable corporations limit the amount which a testator may give to a certain fraction of his estate. Black L.D.

FALL.

As a Noun

Generally, that which falls or has fallen; something in the state of falling or having fallen; descent from a higher to a lower level.³⁹ It has been said that the word "fall," as used in this sense, connotes an unintentional act without foresight or design.^{39.5}

When applied to the seasons of the year, the season when the leaves fall from the trees;⁴⁰ popularly, it is said to cover upward of three months,⁴¹ and to begin on the first of September.⁴²

In a mechanical sense, a device used in connection with a painter's staging to raise and lower it, consisting of four ropes inserted in pulleys, which ropes are attached to a ladder and run from it to the building, where they are connected with a sling by a block and tackle.⁴³

"Falls," when applied to a watercourse, although in the plural form, usually applies to only one locality.⁴⁴

In one or another of the senses above indicated, "fall" has been construed as synonymous with "autumn" and "depression" see the C.J.S. definitions of these terms.

Phrases using the noun are set out in the note.⁴⁵

As a Verb

To descend;^{45.5} to descend from a higher to a lower place or position through loss or lack of support; to come down by tumbling or loss of balance; to drop down; to sink;⁴⁶ to descend by the force or power of gravity;^{46.5} to pass downward freely; to drop; to come or go toward the center of gravity, as of the earth.^{46.10} The word is used primarily of objects freed from their suspension or support.^{46.15}

Derivatively, it is a word much used in common speech to indicate that lands become the property or estate of a particular person upon the occurrence of a particular event;⁴⁷ and in this sense has been defined as meaning to be assigned, to be transmitted, or to merge.⁴⁸

Also, in another derived sense, to arrive, to come, or become, to occur,⁴⁹ the term sometimes implying the happening by chance of an undesigned and involuntary event through external, violent, and accidental means,⁵⁰ as where a building is made to ably parceled out to individuals in the folc-gemote or court of the district, and the grant sanctioned by the freemen who were there present. But, while it continued to be folc-land, it could not be alienated in perpetuity; and therefore, on the expiration of the term for which it had been granted, it reverted to the community, and was again distributed by the same authority. It was subject to many burdens and exactions from which boc-land was exempt." Black L.D.

In Scotch law, to lose or loose.⁵²

Phrases employing the word are set out in the note.⁵³

Falling

The word "falling" is a derivative of "fall," and partakes of the meaning of the verb, and as a present participle it expresses a state of action in progress or a present descending.^{53.5}

"Falling" has been held not synonymous with "accumulating" see the C.J.S. definition of that term.

Whether damage caused by a falling body is to be regarded as due to collision is treated in the C.J.S. definition Collision. See also Insurance § 797.

FALLAR. In Spanish law, to decide a cause, or to render final judgment.⁵⁴

FALLIDO. In Spanish law, a merchant who suspends business on account of inability, caused by misfortune, to pay his debts; frequently distinguished from a bankrupt whose similar inability is caused by his own fraud or misconduct.⁵⁵

FALLO. In Spanish law, the final judgment in a cause.⁵⁶

FALLOPIAN TUBE. An essential part of the female reproductive system consisting of a narrow conduit, some four inches in length, that extends on each side of a woman's body from the base of the womb to the ovary on that side.⁵⁷

FALLOW. Applied to land, barren, unproductive; so when it is left barren and without seed it is said to be, or to lie, fallow.⁵⁸

FALLUM. In old English law, an unexplained term for some particular kind of land.⁵⁹

FALSA DEMONSTRATIO. In the civil law, false designation, or erroneous description of a person or thing in a written instrument.⁶⁰

"Summer fallow" and "summer fallowing"

(1) The terms refer to the agricultural practice of alternating the acreage. That is, one portion of the lands will be harvested and the remaining portion left fallow for that year. The procedure is to plow and disk the area to remain uncultivated, and then leave it barren throughout the summer, with the plan and in the hope that the soil will again be renewed, and its fertility, impaired to some extent through the previous planting, will be restored. It is this scheme of plowing and disking that is called summer fallowing, and lands thus uncultivated beyond the plowing and disking are said to be in summer fallow.

Cal.—May v. American Trust Co., supra.

(2) The plowing of the ground and the harrowing of it during one season preparatory to sowing it for crop during the next season.

Wash.—Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Walla Walla v. Small, 229 P. 531, 533, 131 Wash. 197.

Wis.—Monahan v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York, 212 N.W. 269, 271, 192 Wis. 102.

It is said to be a word of double meaning;⁷² and sometimes connotes an intent to deceive and sometimes does not.⁷³ The true meaning of the term must, as in other instances, often be determined by the context.⁷⁴

Involving evil intent or turpitude. In the more important uses in jurisprudence, and even in its popular application, the word implies something more than a mere untruth, that is an untruth coupled with a lying intent;⁷⁵ and this is described as the primary meaning of the word, importing moral delinquency, or somewhat more than the vernacular sense of erroneous or untrue;⁷⁶ and implying an evil, or a guilty, intent,⁷⁷ an intent to deceive,⁷⁸ or an intention to perpetrate some treachery or fraud,⁷⁹ including not only the element of error, but also that of intentional wrong.⁸⁰

In this sense, the term is most often used to characterize a wrongful or criminal act, such as involves an error or untruth, intentionally or knowingly put forward,⁸¹ or a mere pretense set up in bad faith and without color of fact;⁸² and in this sense the word "false" is defined as meaning assumed or designed to deceive, as a false check or entry, or false colors;⁸³ contrived or calculated to deceive and injure, deceitful;⁸⁴ designedly untrue;⁸⁵ dishonest, given to deceit, unvarnished, or uttering falsehood;⁸⁶ fraudulent;⁸⁷ intentionally or willfully untrue;⁸⁸

(2) The word "false" may mean merely erroneous, incorrect, as well as deceptive.

U.S.—Heindel v. U. S., C.C.A. Ohio, 150 F.2d 493, 498.

(3) The word "false" may be equivalent to intentionally untrue, as involving evil intent or turpitude, or it may be equivalent to erroneous or incorrect.

something designedly untrue, deceitful,⁸⁹ a thing being called "false" when it is done or made with knowledge, actual or constructive, that it is untrue or illegal.⁹⁰

Not involving evil intent or turpitude. The term, however, as often used, does not necessarily involve turpitude of mind,⁹¹ or deliberate deception,⁹² or what is intentionally or fraudulently false,⁹³ and this is described as its secondary sense and not the ordinary or usual signification.⁹⁴

In this sense, the word "false" is defined as meaning erroneous;⁹⁵ false in fact, as distinguished from legal falsity⁹⁶ or from legal insufficiency;⁹⁷ inaccurate;⁹⁸ at variance with the true situation;^{98.5} incorrect;⁹⁹ not according to, or with, truth or reality;¹ contrary to fact;^{1.5} not true;² simply the opposite of correct or true;³ untrue,⁴ as a false statement.⁵

§ 2. Distinguished from Other Torts

False imprisonment has been distinguished from other wrongs, such as false arrest, kidnapping, libel and slander, and trespass.

False imprisonment is a distinct tort, which has been distinguished from various other torts.⁴

False arrest. A false arrest is one means of committing a false imprisonment,⁵ but a false imprisonment may be committed without an arrest,⁶ and a distinction has been drawn between the two in that a false arrest must be committed under assumption of legal authority whereas a false imprisonment may be committed without any pretense of legal authority.⁷

Kidnapping. False imprisonment differs from kidnapping in that the latter is false imprisonment aggravated by removal of the imprisoned person to some other place,⁸ and it has been said that it is the intent of the perpetrator secretly to confine his victim, which distinguishes the offense of kidnapping from that of false imprisonment.⁹

Libel and slander. False imprisonment differs from libel and slander in that these must include the element of malice which is not necessary in false imprisonment,¹⁰ but it is like slander in that good faith will mitigate damages in both.¹¹

§ 3. — Abuse of Process

A distinction ordinarily is recognized between an action for false imprisonment and one for abuse of process, the first lying for detention without due process while the second lies for wrongful use of process duly issued.

A distinction is ordinarily recognized by the courts between an action for false imprisonment and one for abuse of process,¹² although there are decisions and dicta which either refuse to recognize such a distinction or ignore it.¹³ The remedy for malicious abuse of regular process is an action on the case; for the execution of irregular process, the remedy is by action of trespass against the party.¹⁴ Abuse of process lies for the wrongful use of process duly issued, whereas false imprisonment lies for a detention without due process.¹⁵ It follows that a warrant valid on its face may be a defense in false imprisonment, as shown infra § 27, but cannot be a defense to an action for abuse of process, as discussed in Process § 120. While the authorities are in conflict as to whether malice is an essential element of abuse of process, see Process § 120, they are, as shown infra § 7, in harmony on the point that actual malice is unessential in false imprisonment.

A further difference should be noted in that the action for abuse of process accrues and the statute of limitations runs from the date of the misuse of the process, while the action for false imprisonment accrues and the statute runs from the termination of the imprisonment.¹⁶

§ 4. — Malicious Prosecution

The essential difference between a wrongful detention for which an action for malicious prosecution will lie, and one for which an action for false imprisonment is the proper remedy, is that in malicious prosecution the detention is malicious but under the due forms of law, whereas in false imprisonment the detention is without color of legal authority.

Although not always observed,¹⁷ the distinction between malicious prosecution and false imprisonment is fundamental.¹⁸ Historically the distinction grew out of the early cases distinguishing between trespass and the action on the case¹⁹ which later authorities have followed,²⁰ trespass being the common-law remedy for false imprisonment and action on case the remedy for malicious prosecution.²¹

Put briefly, the essential difference between a wrongful detention for which an action for malicious prosecution will lie, and one for which an action for false imprisonment will lie, is that in the former the detention is malicious but under the due forms of law, whereas in the latter the detention is without color of legal authority.²² In malicious prosecution plaintiff must allege and prove malice and want of probable cause and the termination of the proceeding favorably to plaintiff, whereas in false imprisonment it has been stated that the allegation of want of probable cause is not essential,²³ and the burden is on defendant to prove probable

Allegation of malice as conclusive of character of action

A complaint which seeks exemplary damages and is otherwise construable as setting forth a cause of action for false imprisonment should not be interpreted as seeking to set forth a cause of action for malicious prosecution merely because it contains allegations of malice and bad faith on the part of defendant, since the latter allegations are appropriate on the issue of exemplary damages.

II. NATURE AND ELEMENTS

A. IN GENERAL

§ 5. Nature in General

False imprisonment is a tort against the liberty of the person, and its essential elements are detention and the unlawfulness thereof.

False imprisonment is a tort,³² and is in the nature of a trespass, in which the liability of defendant is predicated on personal participation, either directly or indirectly by procurement of others.³³ The right violated by this tort belongs historically to rights in rem—available against the community at large, as distinguished from rights in personam—

available against particular individuals.³⁴

Although the cause of action itself is a property right,³⁵ the gist of the tort is an injury to the person,³⁶ and the primary right involved is the liberty of the citizen, his freedom of locomotion, or right to come, go, or stay when and where he may choose.³⁷ The theory of the law is that one interferes with another's liberty of locomotion at his peril³⁸ and, to escape liability, must justify the interference by proof of its legality.³⁹

Warrant charging no crime

An arrest under a warrant which is void because charging no crime known to the law cannot form the basis of an action for malicious prosecution, especially where the parties acted in good faith, but for detention under such a warrant there may be an action for false imprisonment.

Elements of false imprisonment. Briefly stated, the elements of false imprisonment are twofold: (1) The detention of the person. (2) The unlawfulness of such detention.⁴⁰ It has been said that the true test is not the extent of the restraint, or the means by which it is accomplished, but the lawfulness thereof.⁴¹ The act constituting false imprisonment need not be committed under color of any legal or judicial proceeding.⁴²

Contributory negligence of a plaintiff injured in connection with a false imprisonment may go to the measure of damages but affords no defense to the action itself.⁴³

ment instituted by a false arrest is deemed to begin at the time of the arrest.⁴⁴

§ 6. Intent

Intent to restrain the plaintiff is an essential element of false imprisonment, although there need be no intent to make an arrest. A restraint which is purely accidental, or one which is incidental to the plaintiff's welfare, cannot constitute a false imprisonment.

To constitute false imprisonment, there must be an actual or legal intent to restrain plaintiff,⁴⁵ although there need be no intent to arrest.⁴⁶ Where the restraint is accidental,⁴⁷ or incidental to plaintiff's welfare,⁴⁸ or to a contest for the possession of a chattel,⁴⁹ it has been held not to constitute false imprisonment.

§ 7. Motive or Malice

- a. In general
- b. Probable cause

a. In General

In actions for false imprisonment the motive of the defendant usually is immaterial on the issue of justification; actual malice, as distinguished from legal malice, is not an element of the tort, but both motive and malice become important on the issue of exemplary damages.

It has been broadly stated that to sustain an action for false imprisonment it is unnecessary to show malice,⁵⁰ and it is clear that actual malice or bad motive is not an essential element of the tort.⁵¹ Some authorities express the underlying principle by stating that the tort itself implies malice,⁵² and malice in the sense of "legal malice" has been declared essential to support the action.⁵³

The motive of defendant, although material on the issue of exemplary damages,⁵⁴ is, with some exceptions,⁵⁵ immaterial on the issue of justification.⁵⁶ A lawful imprisonment does not become unlawful because of malicious motives;⁵⁷ nor does an unlawful detention become lawful because actuated by a laudable purpose,⁵⁸ or founded in good faith,⁵⁹ or in ignorance of the law.⁶⁰

Official acting without compensation. The fact that one unlawfully causing the arrest of another was serving in an official capacity without compensation and honestly acted in pursuance of what he believed to be his official duty will not relieve him of liability for false imprisonment.⁶¹

False arrest. Where a false arrest is merely one way of committing a false imprisonment, as discussed supra § 2, malice is immaterial;⁶² but where the term is used to indicate a wrongful arrest made in connection with a malicious prosecution, and plaintiff sues for false arrest and malicious prosecution, he must allege and prove both malice and want of probable cause.⁶³

Advice of counsel. Generally speaking, it is no defense to an action for false imprisonment that defendant acted on legal advice,⁶⁴ although advice of counsel may be shown in mitigation of damages, as discussed infra § 66; and one acting pursuant to the advice and direction of a prosecuting attorney who is regarded as a quasi-judicial officer may be protected against liability for false imprisonment for a restraint imposed under the advice and direction of such official.⁶⁵

In an action for false arrest and malicious prosecution where, as shown supra this section, malice and want of probable cause are essential elements, advice of counsel may afford a defense,⁶⁶ but such advice is no defense unless defendant before obtaining it fully and fairly stated to counsel all material facts within his knowledge.⁶⁷

b. Probable Cause

Probable cause may afford a defense to an action for false imprisonment where the existence of probable cause makes the detention lawful, but probable cause affords no defense in so far as its presence merely negatives the element of actual malice.

There is some confusion in the authorities relative to the necessity for showing a want of probable cause as an element of false imprisonment.⁶⁸ While there are broad judicial statements to the effect that "probable cause" is no defense in false imprisonment cases and that the want thereof is not an essential element of the tort,⁶⁹ and while it is clear that "probable cause" cannot justify a false imprisonment in so far as its presence merely negatives the existence of actual malice,⁷⁰ nevertheless it would seem that "probable cause" in the sense of reasonable ground for effecting an arrest or detention, as discussed infra § 25, may afford a defense to an action for false imprisonment in so far as the presence of such "probable cause" justifies the arrest or other restraint and therefore precludes it from being unlawful or "false."

B. IMPRISONMENT, DETENTION, OR RESTRAINT

1. NECESSITY AND SUFFICIENCY

§ 8. Necessity

Detention or restraint of the person is an essential element of false imprisonment, but actual confinement is not necessary.

It is essential to a cause of action for false imprisonment that there shall have been some detention or restraint of the person of plaintiff,⁷¹ and the mere watching of plaintiff or keeping him un-

Consideration of acts preceding arrest

In action against president of school board for alleged false arrest of plaintiff for maliciously injuring and defacing school building by taking padlock and chain from door which president had placed there to prevent holding of school, acts of president and school board preceding institution of prosecution could be considered in determining whether president acted on probable cause and in good faith and on advice of counsel after full and fair statement of all the facts.

The routine locking of the main doors or gates of a plant, and subsequent refusal to open them to permit egress of an employee desiring to leave during working hours does not constitute a false imprisonment where there are other means of egress,⁷³ and where it does not appear that a foreman refusing to open the gates or doors of a factory to permit egress of an employee had any control over such gates or doors, such refusal does not amount to a false imprisonment.⁷⁴ Visiting a police station with an officer to make a statement,⁷⁵ or for further identification,^{75.5} or mere threats of arrest unaccompanied by any restraint,⁷⁶ will not support an action for false imprisonment. On the other

False arrest. To constitute a false arrest, forming the basis of an action for damages for false imprisonment, there must first be an arrest or actual taking into custody,⁷⁸ or such conduct as would lead a reasonably prudent person to believe that he was arrested,^{78.5} and a claim of false arrest cannot be sustained by proof merely that defendants went in search of plaintiff for the purpose of arresting him,⁷⁹ or by proof that plaintiff voluntarily surrendered to an officer who was without a warrant,⁸⁰ as where, at the request of both child and mother, a child is permitted to accompany its mother to jail.^{80.5}

Demonstration looking toward arrest

An actual manual arrest is not necessary to constitute a "false imprisonment," but a demonstration looking to arrest, which to all appearances can only be avoided by submission, is sufficient.

Mo.—Titus v. Montgomery Ward &
Co., 123 S.W.2d 574, 232 Mo.App.
987.

Arrest not synonymous with false imprisonment

It is elementary that detention is not synonymous with arrest, within principles of false imprisonment.

U.S.—Pollack v. City of Newark, D.
C.N.J., 147 F.Supp. 35, affirmed, a formal declaration of arrest,⁸⁴ or that the person detaining plaintiff should have any real or pretended authority for taking him into custody.⁸⁵ It is sufficient if one is restrained unlawfully in any manner of his right of freedom of locomotion;⁸⁶ and shadowing a person so as to show that, if necessary, force will be used to detain him,⁸⁷ or using improper means to decoy him into the jurisdiction,⁸⁸ may constitute false imprisonment. Where plaintiff is detained for a refusal to comply with a condition, which defendant had no right to impose, defendant is liable.⁸⁹

The detention must have been against the will of the person detained,⁹⁰ who must have been conscious of confinement.^{90.5} A mere voluntary remaining in custody on the part of plaintiff is not sufficient,⁹¹ as, for example, where he submits to avoid the payment of a small license fee,⁹² nor is a voluntary yielding to misrepresentations and threats inducing plaintiff to go to another place and remain in concealment for a time.⁹³

Detention in or of automobile. The driver of a car in which plaintiff is unlawfully made an unwilling passenger falsely imprisons him,⁹⁴ as where the driver so operates the automobile that plaintiff may not leave it with safety,⁹⁵ and a plaintiff may be falsely imprisoned by a combination of orders to remain and disabling of his car which in concert prevent his departure.⁹⁶ Where defendant unlawfully controls and moves plaintiff's car against plaintiff's will and while plaintiff lawfully remains therein, defendant is guilty of a false imprisonment, even though plaintiff was at liberty to step from the car and depart as a pedestrian.⁹⁷

§ 10. — Actual Physical Force

The employment of actual physical force to accomplish the restraint of the plaintiff is sufficient but not essential to constitute a false imprisonment. While false imprisonment includes a technical assault, it is not necessary that there be a battery or actual physical contact with the person of the plaintiff.

detention is sufficient to constitute false imprisonment,⁹⁸ but the employment of such force is not essential,⁹⁹ it being sufficient that a physical restraint be imposed,¹ without a battery or actual physical contact with the person of plaintiff;² nor need there be any injury to the individual's person.³ While false imprisonment always includes at least a technical assault,⁴ an accompanying battery is only incidental.⁵

where an employer interviewing an employee declines to terminate the interview if no force or threat of force is used,¹⁷ and false imprisonment may not be predicated on a person's unfounded belief that he was restrained against his will.¹⁸ Threats of arrest and imprisonment improperly made to induce a confession may invalidate the confession but threats of arrest and imprisonment improperly made to induce a confession have no bearing on the issue of false imprisonment where the person is not detained by force or threats of force.¹⁹

Discussion of charges

Where employee chose to remain in back room of employer's store to discuss charges of theft made against him, and signed two confessions under no restraint other than that if he left he risked the indignity and consequences of an arrest, there was no restraint as would constitute false imprisonment.

Order by frail and elderly woman

Where a shopper was stopped on the street, after leaving a store, by a frail and elderly woman employee who directed her to return to the store and prove that she had not stolen the goods in her possession, and where the woman shopper, younger and larger than such employee, was not in any way frightened but did submit to detention and return as directed, the employee touching her arm but not actually holding her, there was no false imprisonment because the shopper submitted to detention without being in any way compelled to do so by either force or threat.

§ 12. — Submission to Apparent Legal Authority

Detention following submission to the exercise of apparent legal authority may constitute false imprisonment, but merely accompanying an officer who has not taken the plaintiff into actual or constructive custody is not sufficient.

A detention sufficient to support an action for false imprisonment may arise from plaintiff's submission to apparent legal authority,²⁰ as, for example, accompanying an officer who has exhibited a warrant or who demands submission to his authority,²¹ although the submission is induced by fraudu-

Effect of refusal to release

Where branch manager of company and policeman came to school to question group of boys concerning breaking of a lock on door of company's building and stealing certain articles therefrom and took boys with them to see their parents, their accompanying of the officer could be deemed involuntary, and in any event refusal of policeman and manager to release one of boys on request of father of the boy constituted an "arrest" and restraint of boy's liberty, irrespective of whether boy

lent representations.²² However, merely accompanying an officer who has not taken plaintiff into either actual or constructive custody is insufficient to support the action.²³

The submission of plaintiff must not amount to voluntary consent to the detention.²⁴ An arrest, made on process, void on its face, but on the validity of which plaintiff relied and submitted, is actionable,²⁵ but, as shown infra § 45, one who submits to an arrest with knowledge that the arresting officer is acting without proper authority waives his rights by his own conduct. It has been held a legal duty not to resist an arresting officer, and to accompany him without requiring the officer to resort to actual violence to effect the arrest.²⁶

§ 13. — Time and Place

An unlawful and involuntary restraint of the person may constitute false imprisonment irrespective of the length of time it continues or the place wherein it occurs.

A case of false imprisonment is made out whenever the person complaining is actually restrained without legal authority for an appreciable time, however short,²⁷ as, for example, a few minutes,²⁸ or a few hours,²⁹ or a night.³⁰ An actual arrest is sufficient even when followed by plaintiff's immediate release.³¹ On the other hand, if plaintiff was not in fact restrained of his liberty, the length of time during which he remained in a given place under what he mistakenly claimed was a false imprisonment is immaterial.³²

Place. Confinement within any certain designated limits may constitute imprisonment.³³ Detention may amount to false imprisonment although the victim is not confined in prison,³⁴ or even within walls.³⁵ Where, however, a person is not actually restrained of his liberty, and the place wherein he is interviewed by another is in no way improper, the place of such an interview is wholly immaterial to the issue of false imprisonment.³⁶

legal will not constitute a false imprisonment notwithstanding it may have been unjust,⁵³ and, conversely, an illegal detention of a guilty person may amount to false imprisonment.⁵⁴ An action for false imprisonment will not lie for a removal of the prisoner from one place of detention to another under authority of law.⁵⁵

Protection of property. Generally speaking, the owner may restrain one seeking to interfere with his property or to injure it without becoming liable for false imprisonment.⁵⁶ However, the owner of property is not justified in committing a false imprisonment in the process of recapturing it from a person whose original possession was rightful, even though such person may have wrongfully detained it after condition broken.⁵⁷

cation for an alleged false imprisonment is determined by the circumstances existing at the time of the arrest or detention.⁵⁸

§ 15. Persons Privileged from Arrest

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, one may not recover in false imprisonment for a restraint which is merely the violation of a personal privilege from arrest, but a detention in violation of a statute construed as absolutely taking away the right to arrest is illegal and may furnish the basis for an action.

Ordinarily exemptions from arrest are construed to create a personal privilege, and when so construed it is the general rule that an action for false imprisonment does not lie for the arrest of a person so exempted,⁵⁹ against either the party instigating the arrest⁶⁰ or the officer making the arrest.⁶¹ In harmony with the general rule that malice or bad motives are not material considerations in this form of action as distinguished from an action for malicious prosecution, see supra § 7, it is usually held that, where the arrest is made pursuant to valid process of arrest, knowledge that the arrested party is privileged does not impose liability.⁶²

Where statutes affecting the individual's right to freedom from arrest have been construed, not as granting a personal privilege from arrest to the individual, but as absolutely taking away the right to arrest, an arrest in violation of the statute is illegal, and an action lies against the party procuring it,⁶⁵ the judicial official issuing it,⁶⁶ or the officer serving it.⁶⁷

§ 16. Insane Persons

a. In general

b. Detention pursuant to legal proceedings

a. In General

Ordinarily, in the absence of proper legal proceedings it is false imprisonment to restrain a sane person as insane, or to restrain an insane person except where reasonably necessary for the protection of himself or others.

The general rule is that an insane person may, without adjudication, be lawfully restrained of his liberty when not to do so would endanger his own life or those of others,⁶⁸ but that the right of restraint is limited to cases of actual insanity and immediate danger.⁶⁹

An insane person who is committing a breach of the peace may be arrested without process under the same circumstances as one who is sane,⁷⁰ such cases being governed by the principles which apply to cases of arrest on probable cause without process;⁷¹ and similarly an arrest is authorized where there is a reasonable apprehension that injury may be inflicted by him.⁷² It has been held that a physician, who signs a certificate of insanity in the honest belief that the alleged insane person is insane, does not incur liability.⁷³

False imprisonment may be shown by the restraint of a sane person as insane,⁷⁴ and even insanity is not a lawful excuse for restraint where it does not render the victim dangerous to himself or others,⁷⁵ and insane persons who are not dangerous or committing a breach of the peace cannot lawfully be restrained without legal proceedings.⁷⁶ A defendant who has committed an error of judgment in unlawfully restraining an insane person may be held responsible for false imprisonment.⁷⁷ Commitment of one to an insane asylum without certificate of physicians as required by statute imposes a liability for false imprisonment.⁷⁸

Necessity of instituting proceedings for further detention. It is the duty of one who has temporarily restrained an alleged insane person of his liberty to institute proper legal proceedings at once to authorize further detention;⁷⁹ and failure to do so renders him liable as a trespasser ab initio.⁸⁰

Interference with custody. The committee of an incompetent can maintain an action for an unlawful taking of the ward from his custody or the custody of those with whom he temporarily has placed him.⁸¹

b. Detention Pursuant to Legal Proceedings

Commitment of an alleged insane person to an insane asylum cannot ordinarily constitute false imprisonment where it is made pursuant to legal process.

Where the commitment or detention of a person as insane is pursuant to a prescribed legal proceeding, as discussed in Insane Persons §§ 62-72, valid process therein is ordinarily a defense to an action for false imprisonment,⁸² but void process is not

Probability of danger

One who has restrained a person who may be deranged in his mind, must show, in order to justify such conduct, when charged therewith as a wrongful act, not only that the person was insane at the time, but also that to permit him to go at large imperiled his own safety or that of the public, and defendant assumes the burden of showing that fact and the imminent necessity of the restraint, and must show that the danger from plaintiff's being at large was not merely possible, but probable.

County judge

Under state constitution and statutes, county court had jurisdiction of the subject matter of proceeding to commit allegedly insane person to state hospital and of the person of respondent and, in rendering judgment of commitment, county judge acted as a judicial officer and as such was not liable in damages for allegedly illegal confinement of the person committed.

Okl.—Quindlen v. Hirschi, 284 P.2d 723.

Sufficiency of commitment is not to be tested with same strictness as on an appeal or habeas corpus, and the mere fact that in such proceedings, or any other, commitment might be held bad, would not militate against its efficacy as protection from liability in suit for false imprisonment.

Idaho.—Hansen v. Lowe, 100 P.2d 51, 61 Idaho 138.

Formal errors disregarded

Mere omission to insert proper date in jurat was a formal error which could be disregarded.

N.Y.—Williams v. State, 183 N.Y.S. 2d 216.

Protection of private person

A private person, acting in good faith and following the provisions of Insanity Law § 82, outlining the methods for determining the question of insanity, is not liable for alleged incompetent's detention.

N.Y.—Schall v. Irwin, 199 N.Y.S. 141, 120 Misc. 573, affirmed 207 N.Y.S. 914, 212 App.Div. 834.

County clerk, issuing notice of insanity hearing, based on sufficient statement, and warrant of commitment, based on county court's judgment, fair and sufficient on its face, for respondent's commitment to state hospital, through deputy clerk, as required by statute, is not liable to respondent for false imprisonment.
Mo.—Ussery v. Haynes, 127 S.W.2d 410, 344 Mo. 530.

a protection.⁸³ One who merely gives information to a proper judicial officer is protected by the process issuing thereon,⁸⁴ unless the proceeding was instituted in bad faith.⁸⁵

Under statutory provisions authorizing detention of alleged insane persons without application to a court, those restraining such persons pursuant to the terms of the statute are not liable for false imprisonment.⁸⁶ Where statutory provisions authorize commitment on physician's certificates without further judicial proceedings, all who unite in procuring a commitment on false certificates are liable.⁸⁷ Physicians maliciously making false certificates of insanity under which a person is confined in an asylum have been held liable to an action for false imprisonment.⁸⁸

Participation in the detention of an alleged insane person may, if it develops that the process was erroneously issued, impose liability on the party procuring its issuance⁸⁹ and those assisting in the detention,⁹⁰ although it has been held that the superintendent of an insane asylum receiving a patient committed pursuant to statutory procedure is protected against liability for false imprisonment even if it is later shown that commitment was unauthorized.⁹¹ In this connection it has been said that statutes authorizing restraint of personal liberty for any length of time, as in the case of temporary commitment to an insane asylum on a physician's request, should be strictly construed.⁹²

Affidavits made as basis of action

Proceedings for adjudication of insanity and commitment of insane person were "judicial proceedings," and hence affidavits made by alleged insane person's former husband and physicians, on which adjudication was based, were privileged and could not be made basis of action for false imprisonment induced thereby, irrespective of their truth or of malice in making them.

Physicians

(1) County physician, taking no part in actual commitment of alleged insane person to state hospital, although called and testifying as witness at insanity hearing and making out certificate, required by statute to be transmitted to hospital superintendent, at county court's behest, is not liable to such person for false imprisonment.

Mo.—Ussery v. Haynes, 127 S.W.2d 410, 344 Mo. 530.

(2) A person committed to hospital for the insane by order of the district court after a hearing in which she had opportunity to be heard was not entitled to recovery of damages on account of such commitment and restraint against physicians as a result of whose allegedly wrongful or negligent testimony she was ordered committed, in absence of allegation or inference that physicians had anything to do with institution of proceeding for commitment or had any part therein except as witnesses or had conspired with respect thereto.

Physicians

(1) Where physicians appointed by court as committee to examine an alleged insane person failed to do so, thereby depriving such person of an opportunity to be heard, and reported to court their findings that such person was insane, and such person was committed to an asylum for the insane by reason of such report, but, in fact, was not insane, physicians were liable to such person in an action for false imprisonment.

Fla.—Beckham v. Cline, 10 So.2d 419, 151 Fla. 481, 145 A.L.R. 705.

(2) The gravamen of the right of action lies in the failure of the physicians to make such an examination and in the making of a false report to the court that they had examined her and found her to be insane and thereby caused her to be confined in such asylum when, in truth, she was not insane and if physicians had made an examination they would have so discovered.

Restraint under voluntary commitment. Under a statute providing that an asylum may receive for observation and treatment any person so requesting in writing, but that no such person shall be confined for more than a specified number of days after his written notice of desire to leave, without commitment from a court of competent jurisdiction, the asylum is not under an affirmative duty to advise the patient as to how he may obtain his release in order to avoid liability for false imprisonment in detaining him after he wishes to be discharged.⁹³

Police officers may, when acting in good faith, lawfully restrain without process children alleged to be delinquent.

It has been held that, when acting in good faith, police officers, representing the police power of the state, may detain without process a child alleged to be a delinquent, pending an investigation of his delinquency,⁹⁴ and this is so, although they did not comply with the procedure outlined in the Juvenile Delinquent Act.⁹⁵ However, certain officials have been held liable for false imprisonment where they have deprived a parent of the custody of his children without complying with statutory requirements.⁹⁶

§ 18. Prevention of Bodily Harm Justifying Restraint

Reasonable restraint to prevent bodily harm is a justification of a charge of false imprisonment.

Those acting to prevent bodily harm are justified in imposing such restraint as an ordinarily prudent man would deem necessary and reasonable under the circumstances;⁹⁷ but such restraint should not be continued after the danger has passed.⁹⁸ It is no defense to an action for false imprisonment that the unlawful acts of defendant were committed to protect plaintiff from similar acts by others which would have injured him.⁹⁹

§ 19. Authority Arising from Relationship of Parties

The relationship between the parties may be such as to render a restraint lawful as against a charge of false imprisonment.

The relationship existing between the parties may be such as to authorize a restraint which is reasonable under the circumstances,¹ as in the case of the relationship subsisting between participants in a public meeting and the presiding officer authorized by statute to conduct such meeting.² Other particular relationships from which a right of detention may arise precluding liability in false imprisonment include that of guardian and ward,³ parent and child,⁴ and teacher and pupil.⁵ Where a school-age child has care and custody of a nonschool-age child, the school authorities may, on detention of the former, take charge of, and care for, the latter until it can be returned to its parents.^{5.5}

Custodians of institutions. Custodians of institutions are justified in imposing a reasonable restraint on inmates for the purpose of enforcing discipline.⁶ Overseers of the poor, acting under statutory authority, may confine children committed to their charge in such institutions as seem best, and neither such children nor their relatives can later recover in false imprisonment for the children's confinement.⁷

Employer and employee. Statutes providing in general terms that an employee must comply with the lawful directions of his employer concerning the service in which he is engaged and on demand render an account of transactions in the course of his service do not authorize an employer forcibly to detain his employee for the purpose of compelling a confession of a theft from the employer at some prior time.⁸ An employer's investigation of the conduct of a suspected employee must scrupulously avoid trenching on the latter's personal liberty, and, where action justifying personal restraint is indicated, as a general rule such restraint should be effected through the authorities constituted by law for the purpose.⁹ The mere fact that an attempt to apprentice plaintiff to defendant failed because of noncompliance with governing statutory provisions does not show that any false imprisonment was committed.¹⁰

§ 20. Military and Naval Authority

A state of war does not of itself suspend the civil law, and persons not subject to military law may maintain an action for false imprisonment where they are unlawfully arrested or restrained by or at the instance of the military establishment and its officers and officials. Military law, however, governs the arrest and restraint of persons subject thereto and the civil authorities will not interfere with the exercise of military authority within jurisdictional limits, although civil redress may be secured for the wrongful exercise of military authority.

The existence of a state of war does not suspend the civil law or justify the arrest and detention of a citizen without due process, and one connected with the military establishment who participates in such an arrest and detention may become liable for false imprisonment despite the fact that the nation is at war,¹⁸ as where a draft board official secures the arrest on suspicion of one not delinquent but whom he suspects without reasonable grounds of attempting unlawfully to avoid military service.¹⁹ The arrest of persons not subject to military or martial law can be justified on the same principles as apply to other cases.²⁰ Where the offense amounts to a felony, reasonable grounds to suspect that the arrested party is guilty justifies the arrest even where it develops that he was in fact innocent.²¹ Reasonable grounds to suspect the guilt of the arrested party may, even in cases where it does not justify, mitigate damages,²² and so may language provoking the arrest.²³

A military subordinate has been held not to be liable in false imprisonment for acts done in obedience to the orders of his commander, except where the order is palpably illegal.²⁴ An order of a superior officer, although not justifying an inferior officer in making the arrest, may mitigate the damages.²⁵ As in arrests by civil authority, the detention should not be accompanied with unnecessary harshness.²⁶

On the other hand, military law governs the arrest and detention of persons subject to such law for offenses within the cognizance of the military authorities.²⁷ The civil courts do not interfere with acts of military authorities within the scope of their jurisdiction,²⁸ although the injured person may obtain redress against the wrongdoer in the civil courts for malicious exercise of lawful authority,²⁹ or for acts in excess of authority, although done in good faith.³⁰ Liability in damages may be incurred for cruel treatment even if the detention was lawful.³¹ It seems that the arrest of a civilian whose conduct tended to create a breach of discipline among soldiers may be justified.³²

Martial law justifies arrests deemed necessary or advisable by the military authorities.³³

Local disturbances. Some courts, in analogy to cases governed by martial law, have maintained that where the local disturbance is so great that the militia have been called out to restore order the civil authorities become subordinate to the military, which may take such action as the circumstances require.³⁴ An arrested party may be detained until the disturbance is suppressed before being delivered to the civil authorities.³⁵ It has been maintained, however, that the right of the militia to arrest, when duly called out to suppress local disturbances, is the same as that of peace officers.³⁶

§ 21. Detention or Restraint without Process

Illegal detention or restraint without process constitutes false imprisonment.

A detention without process and without a view to public prosecution for an offense is ordinarily illegal,³⁷ but in some jurisdictions, in the reasonable exercise of the police power, peace officers may detain a person, under some circumstances, for a reasonable time for investigation without incurring liability for false imprisonment.³⁸ Although reasonable detention following a lawful arrest is justifiable,³⁹ generally the imprisonment of another without a mittimus or other lawful process is illegal, and imposes liability in damages to the one injured thereby.⁴⁰

If the original arrest was illegal, the detention of the arrested person in a cell is also illegal and a continuing tort,⁴¹ and, conversely, it has been said that an illegal arrest is necessary in order to constitute a false imprisonment where the detention charged is detention in jail by an officer after arrest.⁴² The power to arrest does not confer on the arresting officer the power to detain a prisoner for other purposes, and if he does so he is liable for false imprisonment.⁴³

Where the statute prescribes the circumstances under which an arrest without a warrant may be made, an arrest by an officer or another person without a warrant not within the statute is illegal and a ground for an action for false imprisonment.⁴⁴ Acts, if unlawful under the name of arrest and imprisonment, are equally unlawful if termed a taking into custody and restraint.⁴⁵ Private persons who are liable for making an illegal arrest without a warrant may also be liable for the detention of the person arrested after he has been turned over to the police.⁴⁶ The right which in certain instances exists to arrest without warrant on a criminal charge does not extend to civil cas-

As a general rule, if a detention or arrest is unlawful, it may be the basis for a suit for false imprisonment, without regard to whether it was with or without probable cause.⁴⁸ In some jurisdictions in order to recover for false arrest it must be shown that the restraint was unreasonable and such as was not warranted by the circumstances.⁴⁹ Accordingly, in such jurisdictions it is held that, where defendant had probable cause to believe that plaintiff was about to injure him in his person or property, even though such injury would constitute but a misdemeanor, it is a defense to an action for false imprisonment if the detention was reasonable.⁵⁰

To justify, in an action for false imprisonment, an

Peace officers have no right to arrest simply by virtue of their office; their justification must depend on the fact that the arrest was made under circumstances warranted by law or on the issuance of valid process.⁵² An officer to justify because of his official character must show the fact of holding law, and store employees made reasonable investigation by telephoning man's real wife and unsuccessfully attempting to telephone man himself, there was no "false imprisonment" in detaining plaintiff and sister-in-law until goods were returned, notwithstanding plaintiff and sister-in-law had no criminal intent and acted under instructions from such man. *Mo.—Teel v. Unconstitutional, invalid, or inapplicable ordinances

(1) While a detention made in good faith reliance on ordinance valid on its face, but invalid or inapplicable in fact, may be privileged within rule that conscious confinement of a person without his consent is civilly actionable unless privileged, that privilege does not extend to a detention by those who know or who have reason to believe that the ordinance is invalid or inapplicable.

U.S.—Miller v. Stinnett, C.A.N.M., 257 F.2d 910.

(2) Sheriff and his deputy could not be held liable in damages in suit for allegedly unlawful arrest and false imprisonment of plaintiffs, even if the municipal ordinance which plaintiffs were charged with violating were unconstitutional, since they were entitled to act on the assump-

office at the time of the questioned conduct.⁵³

For felony. In view of the general rule that a peace officer may, without a warrant, arrest a person whom he has probable cause to believe guilty of a felony, discussed in Arrest § 6 b (a), a peace officer is not liable in an action for false imprisonment for an arrest on a charge of felony, although no felony has in fact been committed if he has reasonable grounds to suspect that such an offense has been committed and that the person arrested is guilty.⁵⁴ The fact that the officer's justification does not depend on whether a felony has been actually committed is a distinguishing feature between his liability and that of a private individual.⁵⁵ A peace officer may justify, in an action of this character, an arrest without warrant for a felony committed in his presence,⁵⁶ or when he has reasonable grounds to suppose that the arrested person is about to commit a felony.⁵⁷

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, it is usually held that, to justify an arrest without warrant, it is not necessary there should be danger of the escape of accused,⁵⁸ although some courts seem to have maintained a rule to the contrary,⁵⁹ but danger that a felon will flee from justice or will obliterate the evidences of his crime are justifications for prompt action in his arrest.⁶⁰

Statutory provisions may modify the right to arrest without warrant for felony, and, where such is the case, the officer is liable unless the arrest is authorized by statute.⁶¹ It is not a defense that the officer supposed he had process whereas in fact he had none.⁶² An officer may justify in an action for false imprisonment under a statute providing that any peace officer may, without a warrant, arrest a person when he has received positive information by written, telegraphic, or other authoritative source that another officer holds a warrant for such arrest.⁶³

For misdemeanors. A peace officer is not liable to an action for false imprisonment for the arrest by him without warrant of one who is committing a breach of the peace in his presence;⁶⁴ but, conversely, at common law, as regards liability for tion that all public laws and ordinances of municipalities are constitutional.

Vt.—Rugg v. Degnan, 118 A. 588, 96 Vt. 175.

Intoxication at home

To authorize an arrest, without warrant, of one who becomes intoxicated in his own home, there must be some breach of the public peace. This is true even though the intoxi-

false imprisonment, an officer has no authority to arrest, without a warrant, a person charged with the commission of a misdemeanor except where the offense is committed in the officer's presence.⁶⁵ Under this justification the officer must be allowed a reasonable time and fit opportunity to make the arrest,⁶⁶ but he may not arrest for a breach of the peace which has subsided prior to the arrest.⁶⁷

A peace officer is also justified in arresting to prevent a breach of the peace, or where there is reasonable apprehension of a renewal thereof;⁶⁸ but he cannot justify the arrest of one person on the ground that it was necessary to prevent another person from committing a breach of the peace.⁶⁹ He may also arrest a person who resists the proper enforcement of the law.⁷⁰ Where under the circumstances an officer is unauthorized to make an arrest, without a warrant, for a misdemeanor, he cannot justify the arrest on the ground that it was necessary to prevent an escape.⁷¹

In accordance with the rules governing his right to arrest, discussed in Arrest § 6 c (1), under the statutes of most jurisdictions a peace officer may justify, in an action for false imprisonment, an arrest without a warrant for misdemeanors and other violations of the law, although not necessarily amounting to a breach of the peace, when committed in his presence,⁷² the elements of justification being that the statutory provision authorizing the arrest is valid,⁷³ that the offense falls within the terms of the statute,⁷⁴ that it was being committed in the officer's presence,⁷⁵ and that the person arcated person may need care, since if he has surrounded himself with some care it is not a question for police officers to determine whether such care is adequate.

rested was guilty.⁷⁶ It seems, however, that the arrest need not be made at the very moment of the commission of the offense.⁷⁷ Nevertheless, if the officer witnessing an offense authorizing arrest without warrant departs, he cannot justify an arrest made without warrant on his return after an interval of time, and the shortness of the interval does not affect the right to justify the arrest.⁷⁸ Under some statutes police officers of cities of a certain class may arrest, on view, any person they have reason to suspect of having violated any law of the state or ordinance of the city, and an arrest so made damages no one.⁷⁹

Where, under the circumstances, the officer is not empowered to arrest without a warrant, neither actual belief in the guilt of the arrested party nor reasonable grounds to suspect him to be guilty constitutes a justification.⁸⁰ In some jurisdictions under the statutes a peace officer may justify an arrest without a warrant if he had reasonable grounds to believe that a misdemeanor was being committed in his presence.⁸¹ Where statutes enlarge the right to arrest to include, for instance, violations of law not committed in the officer's presence, he must, to justify, show reasonable grounds to believe that the arrested party was guilty,⁸² and, where there is a right to arrest for an offense not committed in the officer's presence, if the offender is attempting to escape or for other reasons there is likely to be a failure of justice for want of an officer to issue a warrant, such facts must be shown to justify the arrest.⁸³

Where, under the statute, an officer may make an arrest when a criminal offense has in fact been committed, although not in his presence, and he has reasonable ground for believing that the person to be arrested has committed it, in order to justify an arrest and imprisonment for an offense not committed in his presence he must show that an offense actually has been committed, and reasonable grounds for believing that an offense has been committed is not sufficient.⁸⁴ In some jurisdictions the police officer need not justify an arrest by a subsequent showing that as a matter of fact the offense was committed;⁸⁵ but, where statutory enactments authorize arrests on suspicion for offenses other than felonies, an arrest is not justified without proof of reasonable grounds of suspicion,⁸⁶ and, where a statutory provision requires reasonable proof of the commission of the offense to authorize an arrest therefor, mere reasonable grounds of suspicion are not sufficient.⁸⁷

Under some statutes police officers have power to arrest, or at least to detain for a reasonable time for investigation, a nonresident driver of a motor vehicle who is unable to produce the vehicle registration certificate or his driver's license.⁸⁸

Under federal statutes providing that state officers may issue process for apprehension of offenders against federal laws, an arrest without process for a misdemeanor under federal laws is illegal.⁸⁹

§ 23. — Arrests by Private Persons

A lawful arrest without a warrant by a private person does not constitute a false imprisonment.

An action for false imprisonment will not lie for an arrest without warrant by a private person for a felony committed in the past where the offense had actually been committed and defendant had reasonable grounds for suspecting that the arrested person was guilty.⁹⁰ It has been suggested by some courts that it must be shown that the person arrested was actually guilty of the felony.⁹¹ If no felony has actually been committed, reasonable suspicion only mitigates damages,⁹² and the fact that the person making the arrest believed in good faith an offense to be a felony, whereas in fact it was a misdemeanor not authorizing arrest without warrant, does not justify the arrest.⁹³

A private person's right to justify an arrest without a warrant may be varied by statutes modifying an individual's power to arrest,⁹⁴ as, for instance, by giving him the right to arrest on reasonable grounds for believing the arrested person had committed a felony,⁹⁵ or, on the other hand, by confining the right to arrest to offenses actually committed by the person arrested.⁹⁶ Under a statute giving a private person the right to arrest if he is acting on "certain" information that a felony has been committed, it is unnecessary as an actual fact that a felony has been committed in order to permit a private citizen to make an arrest.⁹⁷ Under some statutes a private individual may arrest only for a crime committed or attempted in his presence.⁹⁸

Fugitives from justice. A private individual is liable, it seems, for arresting another without warrant for a felony committed in another state, unless he can justify by showing that he proceeded according to the statutory provisions.⁹⁹

For misdemeanors. Although there is some authority apparently to the contrary,^{99.5} an arrest

99.5 In Ohio

(1) It has been stated to be the law that no person except an officer has the right to make an arrest for a misdemeanor, without a warrant. Ohio.—Fitscher v. Rollman & Sons Co., 167 N.E. 469, 31 Ohio App. 340.

without warrant by a private individual for a breach of the peace committed in his presence is justified;¹ but reasonable grounds for belief in the arrested person's guilt do not constitute a justification,² nor is the mental attitude of the person causing the arrest important.³ After the breach of the peace has ceased a person is not justified in arresting the one who committed it,⁴ unless there is a well-founded apprehension that it will be renewed.⁵ A private person may also arrest one who interferes with him while he is lawfully making an arrest.⁶

Under some statutes regulating the right of an individual to arrest without a warrant, in order so to justify the arrest that it does not constitute a false imprisonment, the misdemeanor committed must amount to a breach of the peace,⁷ but under other statutes arrests without warrant by private individuals for misdemeanors, when committed in the presence of the arresting person, may be justified, even though the misdemeanors do not in all cases amount to a breach of the peace.⁸

It is not justifiable to arrest one who is not engaged in a breach of the peace or other misdemeanor,⁹ although the person making the arrest had probable cause to believe in the guilt of the arrested person.¹⁰ Thus liability is incurred for the arrest of one who is merely committing a civil trespass on another's lands,¹¹ unless statutory provisions make such trespass a misdemeanor,¹² or justifiably repelling one who is attempting to commit a trespass on the arrested person's lands,¹³ or disregarding the regulations of a carrier¹⁴ or restaurant proprietor,¹⁵ or who refuses to pay a fare which

(2) Accordingly, detention of plaintiff by store detective who was not a duly commissioned peace officer on charge of shoplifting was violation of plaintiff's rights.

Shoplifting

Where a storekeeper sees and knows that a customer is taking and wrongfully carrying away merchandise from his store, he has the right to accost the culprit and prevent the attempted "shoplifting" or larceny of his goods; but a merchant conducting a self-serving store does not have a right to apprehend and detain a customer and inspect her parcels and packages on the mere suspicion of her "shoplifting" based only on her failure to heed or comply with some rule or regulation of the self-serving store requiring customer to present for checking the merchandise she is carrying, regardless of whether it was elsewhere purchased or paid for when purchased.

the carrier is entitled to demand,¹⁶ or an innkeeper's bill,¹⁷ or who, not being intoxicated, is merely attempting to board a train for which he has a ticket.¹⁸ Where the evidence discloses that the arrest and imprisonment were for the purpose of coercing payment of a civil demand due defendant, he cannot justify his action on the theory that he had a right to arrest plaintiff for an offense committed in his presence.¹⁹

§ 24. — Individual Directing Arrest or Giving Information

An individual who directs or requests an illegal arrest is liable for false imprisonment, but one who merely gives information regarding an offense does not incur liability.

Quoted in: Neb.—Edgar v. Omaha Public Power Dist., 89 N.W.2d 238, 241, 166 Neb. 452.

An individual who directs or requests a peace officer to make an arrest which turns out to be illegal will be liable in the same manner as if he had made the arrest himself,²⁰ however pure his motives may have been.²¹ Conversely a private individual is exonerated who procures an officer to make an arrest which he might lawfully have made himself.²² The person directing an unlawful arrest may be liable, although the officer acting is exonerated.²³ A doctrine to the contrary, however, has been maintained by some courts to the effect that, if the arrest is made by an officer under circumstances rendering legal an arrest by him, the person who instigated it cannot be held liable, although such person's conduct would have been unlawful had he made the arrest.²⁴ The fact that the officer acted wrongfully in making the arrest does not absolve the person who instigated the arrest.²⁵

What is a direction or request sufficient to impose liability within the meaning of this rule depends on the facts of each case,²⁶ and may be inferred from circumstances as well as established by direct proof.²⁷ It is not essential that there should be evidence of express command or direction to the officer to arrest,²⁸ nor is it essential that the party directing the arrest be present at the time of the arrest,²⁹ although the fact that he was not present at the time has been considered in determining that he did not direct or instigate the arrest;³⁰ and it should appear that the arrest or unlawful detention was made pursuant to his direction or request,³¹ and, if the officer acts solely on his own judgment, defendant will not be responsible, even though he directs or requests such action, and even though he is actuated by malice or other improper motive.³² A request that officers remove a person from another's premises is not a request for an arrest,^{32.5} and the removal of such person is not an arrest.^{32.10}

No liability can attach to a person directing an arrest where it is the officer's duty to make the arrest, regardless of the direction from such person.³³

In debtor's action against creditor for arrest of debtor for alleged intent to leave state with property beyond need for support, where evidence warranted finding that creditor directed deputy to arrest debtor without notice, that officer, instead of obeying instructions, conferred with attorney of debtor, and arranged to make arrest on return of debtor to state, and provided opportunity for debtor to obtain bail, was no defense, since deputy's actions were less drastic than creditor's instructions.

Failure to discourage

place of business where man was endeavoring to sell him diamond was not liable for illegal arrest of such man by officers after investigation, notwithstanding person summoning police officer was present at all times during investigation and when arrest was made, where he did not direct or request arrest, notwithstanding he did nothing to prevent or discourage it, and stated that officer had his permission to call other officers.

Transportation of officer

Where probable cause existed for arrest, and persons with arresting officer did nothing to effect arrest or imprisonment except to transport officer and prisoner to police station, where officer was required to take prisoner, such persons and their employer were not liable for false arrest or imprisonment.

Individuals giving information. One who merely gives information regarding an offense justifying arrest does not incur liability,³⁴ even though the party giving the information acted maliciously or without probable cause.³⁵

Participating. An individual incurs liability for an arrest without process, if going beyond merely giving information he participates in making an arrest which turns out to have been unlawful.³⁶

§ 25. — Reasonable Grounds of Suspicion

Reasonable and probable grounds for suspicion of guilt are generally, although not by all authorities, regarded as equivalent to a reasonable and probable cause for belief in guilt. What constitutes such grounds depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

Reasonable and probable grounds for suspicion of the guilt of a person arrested which may, under the circumstances considered supra §§ 21-24, constitute a justification for his arrest without a warrant, and constitute a defense in an action for false imprisonment, are ordinarily regarded by the courts as equivalent to reasonable and probable cause for a belief in his guilt,³⁷ although by other authorities

Application for assistance

Defendant's application to sheriff for assistance in determining whether named persons had defendant's personalty did not make defendant liable for alleged false imprisonment of woman in named persons' party by police officer to whom sheriff phoned. Fla.—Camp v. Silas, 151 So. 706, 113 Fla. 323.

Identification

(1) In action for false arrest and imprisonment of plaintiff as the man named in swindling indictment, bank officers who innocently identified plaintiff as the man with whom they had had the transaction which resulted in the swindling indictment were not liable, in absence of evidence that officers induced, requested or directed the deputy sheriff to make the arrest.

Tex.—Schnauffer v. Price, Civ.App., 124 S.W.2d 940, error refused.

(2) Accompanying a police officer to identify one suspected of an offense or to identify property involved therein is no more than the giving of information in assistance of the officer, and unless accompanied by acts of affirmative direction, persuasion, or request for, or voluntary participation in, an arrest and imprisonment of the suspected offender, informer is not liable for false arrest and imprisonment.

a distinction has been drawn between suspicion of guilt and belief in guilt, and it has been held that the facts constituting probable cause for suspicion may not be sufficient to induce a belief in guilt.³⁸ Actual belief, without reasonable grounds therefor, is not a sufficient justification,³⁹ nor is mere suspicion without reasonable grounds therefor.⁴⁰

Whether such grounds exist must be judged by circumstances existing at the time of the arrest,⁴¹ and does not depend on the actual guilt or innocence of the person arrested.⁴² The arrest must be made on the volition of the person making it because of reasonable grounds of suspicion possessed by him and not because of the command or direction of another;⁴³ but this does not mean that an officer's information creating the reasonable grounds of suspicion may not be derived from others,⁴⁴ including the person directing or requesting the arrest.⁴⁵ An arrest without a warrant cannot be justified by what the officers learned only by reason thereof.⁴⁶

What constitute reasonable grounds of suspicion. It is obvious that what constitute reasonable grounds of suspicion must depend on the facts and circumstances of the particular case.⁴⁷ Those facts and circumstances should be such as would justify

Informant having mere suspicion

An officer has no authority to arrest on mere belief that a person has been guilty of an offense, if such belief has no foundation in fact or sufficient circumstances on which to rest, or if the officer acts unreasonably at the request of a third person who himself has only a mere suspicion of the guilt of one who is arrested.

Good faith is not enough to constitute probable cause, but such faith must be grounded on facts within the knowledge of the person who makes the arrest.⁵³ Accusation of a fellow employee by an employee guilty of theft may constitute reasonable ground for suspicion.⁵⁴ A warrant for arrest which does not justify its execution may be sufficient as a reasonable cause to believe that the person arrested has committed a felony when it charges him with felony.⁵⁵

making of such investigations as the circumstances permit.⁵⁷

Effect of subsequent proceedings. The disposition made of accused after his arrest may have a bearing in determining whether or not reasonable grounds for suspicion existed justifying his arrest,⁵⁸ such as his discharge at the preliminary hearing,⁵⁹ his acquittal after trial or examination,⁶⁰ or perhaps his release on habeas corpus.⁶¹ Some cases hold that it is not even prima facie evidence of want of reasonable grounds of suspicion that he is discharged or acquitted,⁶² or that the jury disagree.⁶³ In any event the outcome of such subsequent proceedings is not regarded as conclusively establishing the lack of probable cause.⁶⁴ It is prima facie evidence that reasonable grounds of suspicion existed at the time of the arrest that accused was held by the magistrate after examination for trial by a higher court⁶⁵ or was indicted by the grand jury.⁶⁶

It has been held that the fact that plaintiff was convicted of the charge for which the arrest was made is conclusive,⁶⁷ or at least prima facie⁶⁸ evidence, of the existence of probable cause, unless the conviction was obtained by corrupt or undue means.⁶⁹ It has also been held that a conviction of accused is conclusive evidence of probable cause unless it was obtained by fraud or unfair means even though on appeal the conviction is set aside or accused acquitted.⁷⁰ The fact that a judgment of conviction was properly set aside by the court in which it was entered does not alone show want of probable cause.⁷¹

§ 26. Detention or Restraint under Process

Detention or restraint under valid process is discussed infra § 27, and under void, erroneous, or irregular process infra § 28.

§ 27. — Valid Process

An action for false imprisonment may not be maintained where an arrest or detention is made by virtue of process, legally sufficient in form, and duly issued by a court or official having jurisdiction to issue it.

It is a complete defense to an action for false imprisonment that the arrest or detention was by virtue of process, legally sufficient in form, and duly issued by a court or official having jurisdiction to issue it.⁷² The fact that the person arrested was

Essentials stated

"It has been generally declared that in order that process may afford protection to the executive officer executing the same (1) the issuing court must have had jurisdiction of the subject-matter on which it acted in issuing said process . . . (2) the court must have had colorable authority to issue the process in question . . . (3) the process must be in the prescribed form or be a substantial compliance therewith; and (4) the process must not be void on its face."

Ala.—Phillips v. Morrow, 104 So. 260, 261, 213 Ala. 139, 40 A.L.R. 285, followed in Phillips v. Bailey, 104 So. 264, 213 Ala. 142.

Court order

(1) Sheriff and deputy, who imprisoned individual in accordance with chancellor's order, were not liable to the individual for false imprisonment, although chancellor's order may have been illegal, in view of the fact that the sheriff had to obey the order or subject himself to punishment for contempt.

Miss.—DeWitt v. Thompson, 7 So.2d 529, 192 Miss. 615.

(2) Under statutes providing for commitment of person mentally ill, where officers acted pursuant to court order to arrest and detain plaintiff as directed, they were fully protected from liability for so doing, although they did not possess a warrant or make return.

Ariz.—Savage v. Boies, 272 P.2d 349, 77 Ariz. 355.

(3) Sheriff, county jail warden, and two deputy sheriffs, carrying out county judge's order, which he had jurisdiction to make, in removing woman to hospital psychopathic ward from county jail, to which she had been remanded by police justice after binding her over to grand jury on charge of injuring public record, were not liable to her for false imprisonment.

Person privileged from arrest

Officer acting according to his precept in making arrest is, not trespasser, although person arrested is privileged from arrest.

Me.—Bragg v. Hatfield, 130 A. 233, 124 Me. 391.

Truth or falsity of complaint immaterial

Whether complaint on which arrest was made was true or false is immaterial in an action for false imprisonment.

Ohio.—Click v. Parish, 98 N.E.2d 333, 89 Ohio App. 318, affirmed 98 N.E. 2d 293, 155 Ohio St. 84.

Restraint under search warrant

(1) Reasonable surveillance of the party whose premises are being searched is authorized by a search warrant, and defendant keeping watch over plaintiff during search of plaintiff's premises under valid search warrant and preventing plaintiff from leaving room was not guilty of unlawful restraint of plaintiff's liberty.

Mo.—Harbison v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 37 S.W.2d 609, 327 Mo. 440, 79 A.L.R. 1.

(2) Officer holding a search warrant need have no fear of any civil action for damages against him for any unlawful arrest even though no contraband be found in possession of accused, and if contraband is discovered, arrest is then conclusively justified.

Tenn.—Murphy v. State, 254 S.W.2d 979, 194 Tenn. 698.

(3) Fact, however, that officers, in false imprisonment and arrest suit, had search warrant would not justify arrest.

Ga.—Sharpe v. Frost, 95 S.E.2d 309, 94 Ga.App. 444.

Person assisting in arrest

Under Connecticut law of false arrest and imprisonment, if municipal police officer was authorized to arrest railroad employee, no liability could attach to railroad for the assistance given officer by railroad detective in making the arrest.

process did so from malicious⁷⁶ or other improper⁷⁷ motives, or obtained it by misrepresentations⁷⁸ or nondisclosure of facts,⁷⁹ does not prevent the process from being a complete protection. Likewise the fact that the committing magistrate acted maliciously does not go to the validity of his acts, but only to his motives, and the fact that the magistrate so acted does not constitute false imprisonment.⁸⁰

If the detention is under valid process, the person wrongfully detained must seek his remedy in some other form of action,⁸¹ the want of probable cause for belief in the guilt of accused not being material in this form of action.⁸² If the issuance of process is merely a sham to cover extortion or for some purpose other than a legal prosecution for an offense justifying arrest, some decisions hold that it is not a protection,⁸³ whereas others hold that such a purpose does not prevent it from being a shield against an action for false imprisonment.⁸⁴

Such process is a protection only while it is in force,⁸⁵ and for an arrest thereunder within the jurisdiction of the court issuing it.⁸⁶

Form and requisites. Process in order to afford protection against an action for false imprisonment within this rule must be valid, although it may be informal or erroneous.⁸⁷ The validity of the process is not destroyed by defects which amount only to irregularities.⁸⁸ In the absence of statutory prescription as to form, process good at common law is sufficient.⁸⁹ Where, however, a statute applies, process must conform to its essential requirements.⁹⁰

Malicious prosecution

Where arrest of which plaintiff complains was made under authority of a valid process, his remedy is an action for malicious prosecution, so that where plaintiff's arrest and detention in jail on charge of delivering check not backed by sufficient funds were under a valid warrant of arrest, plaintiff's remedy against defendants who procured the warrant was not that of an action for false imprisonment but was solely that of an action for malicious prosecution, even though warrant, which originally ran to the apparently fictitious drawer of the check, was amended at direction of defendants to include the name of plaintiff.

To constitute valid process affording a protection against false imprisonment, ordinarily process of arrest should run in the name of the state or sovereignty whose judicial officer issues it;⁹¹ but process in the name of the magistrate issuing it has been sustained as valid where statutory provisions did not prohibit.⁹² Further it should ordinarily show jurisdiction of the magistrate or judicial officer issuing it,⁹³ and should contain a command to the person to whom it is directed to make the arrest.⁹⁴ As a general rule the process must correctly name the person to be arrested,⁹⁵ or sufficiently identify him by description.⁹⁶ It has been held that process is not void in its face because of the want of a recital that a complaint or oath has been filed, it being presumed that the magistrate acted in conformity to law until the contrary appears.⁹⁷

The process, to be within the rule, should also recite the substance of the charge or reason for commitment,⁹⁸ although there is authority to the effect that at common law the recital in a warrant of the substance of the charge was not essential,⁹⁹ where it was in a process of commitment.¹ The warrant is sufficient in this respect if it designates the offense either by name only or by words from which it may be inferred.² Process of arrest usually contains a command to make a return of the warrant and the officer's doings thereunder,³ but a failure to have it made returnable to a proper officer or court has been held to be a mere irregularity, so that the process afforded protection to the arresting officer.⁴

The process should doubtless be dated,⁵ and statutes ordinarily require that a warrant of arrest should be signed by the court or officer issuing it; warrants not properly signed have been held to afford no protection.⁶ It seems that at common law a seal was not necessary in order for a warrant to afford protection, even in criminal cases,⁷ although there is also authority to the contrary.⁸ In particular instances a statute may require that the warrant be under seal,⁹ and, by the weight of authority, it is not now essential unless a statute requires it.¹⁰ An alteration or spoliation of an information after it has been issued does not affect its validity in the form as it appeared without the alteration, if it is legible in such original form and was not thus altered by him who justifies under it.¹¹

Persons protected. The defense that the arrest or detention was pursuant to valid process is available to the party procuring its issuance,¹² the ju-

Where action was instituted before a justice of the peace whose eyes were bad on account of a cataract and the justice requested his secretary to sign his name to the summons which the secretary did in presence of the justice and under his supervision, the summons was valid and defendant who was taken into custody on an execution until the judgment was paid could not recover in an action for false arrest since under the circumstances the magistrate could deputize another to sign his name to the summons.

Parties who procure legal process are not accountable for an unlawful manner of executing it by the officer,²⁴ or because without participation therein by them the execution of the process is intrusted to an unauthorized person,²⁵ but may render themselves joint trespassers by participating in, assisting, commanding, or advising improper conduct.²⁶ If, however, the person executing the process is the agent of the one instigating the arrest, such principal may be liable for the unlawful acts of his agent.²⁷

Probable cause

In suit for damages for false imprisonment, essential to the right to recover is the want on defendant's part of probable cause to believe plaintiff guilty of the offense charged, and when defendant has in good faith fully and fairly stated all the material facts within his knowledge to the prosecutor and signed the complaint on the latter's advice, a case of probable cause is established barring plaintiff's right to recover.

Mich.—Gooch v. Wachowiak, 89 N.W. 2d 496, 352 Mich. 347.

Sufficiency of information

Where defendant is charged with false imprisonment for causing plaintiff's arrest under a warrant which is alleged to have been void for want of sufficient information, great latitude of construction should be indulged in testing the sufficiency of such information, and neither complainant nor the justice of the peace should be made to respond in damages for failure to display a learning which they could not be presumed to possess. When so construed, the information is held not to be jurisdictionally defective and the warrant issued thereon a protection to defendant.

a. In General

In determining liability for false imprisonment, a distinction has been drawn between void, erroneous, and irregular process.

While the courts ordinarily distinguish between void and voidable process in determining liability for false imprisonment, there is, however, some apparent confusion in the decisions as to the use of the terms.²⁸ Void process has been defined to be such as the court has no power to award, or has not acquired jurisdiction to issue in the particular case, or which does not in some material respect comply in form with the legal requisites of such process, or which loses its vitality in consequence of noncompliance with a condition subsequent, obedience to which is rendered essential.²⁹ It is not necessary to set aside void process before starting suit for false imprisonment.³⁰

Erroneous process. Erroneous process usually signifies process issued because of the mistake or error of the court in a proceeding properly brought before it.³¹ It is a protection for acts done under it while it was in force.³²

Irregular process. Irregular process has been broadly defined to be such as the court has general jurisdiction to issue but which is unauthorized in the particular case by reason of the existence or nonexistence of some fact or circumstance rendering it improper in the given case.³³ The term has also been used in a narrower sense to mean process in obtaining which the party has proceeded without taking the steps required by law.³⁴ In the latter sense the distinction from erroneous process lies in the fact that in the case of an arrest under irregular process the party is responsible for irregularity, and in the case of an arrest under erroneous process the court is responsible.³⁵ Irregular process is a protection until set aside,³⁶ and, before the arrested party can sue for false imprisonment, it is usually necessary to have the irregular process vacated by the court,³⁷ although in cases where the process is issued as a matter of course or ministerially, it seems that it may not be necessary to have it set aside.³⁸ When set aside it is not a protection to the party who procured it, even for acts done under it while in force,³⁹ although it protects the officer serving it.⁴⁰

(a) In Criminal Cases

The individual who merely makes a complaint or gives information concerning an alleged offense to the officer issuing the process is generally not liable for false imprisonment, even though the process was erroneously issued.

The general rule is that one who merely makes a complaint or lays facts before a judicial officer in a matter over which the officer has general jurisdiction is not liable for an arrest or detention under process issued by the officer, although its issuance was erroneous in the particular case, in the absence of any further action on his part constituting a participation in the arrest or detention.⁴¹ He is protected because he has set a judicial officer in motion,⁴² and what that officer does, acting on his own responsibility, is not to be charged to complainant.⁴³ Complainant is not to be held liable if the proceedings taken by the judicial officer contain defects or omissions,⁴⁴ or if the magistrate unlawfully directs arrest without warrant.⁴⁵ The rule is otherwise, however, where complainant secures the issuance of process by a judicial officer who is entirely without jurisdiction.⁴⁶

According to the weight of authority complainant is protected where he does nothing more than lay the facts before the magistrate, although the facts are insufficient to show that the offense charged, or, indeed, any offense, has been committed.⁴⁷ More particularly is this true where the facts presented by complainant present in a slight degree a question calling for a judicial determination as to whether a crime has been committed by the party charged,⁴⁸ and as the attack on sufficiency of the complaint or information is not made directly, but in a collateral proceeding, great latitude of construction in sustaining the charge is indulged in.⁴⁹ Under this rule complainant may be protected, although it is apparent that the offense is barred by the statute of limitations,⁵⁰ and although the offense is not alleged to have been committed within the jurisdiction,⁵¹ or although he knew that the facts stated did not constitute an offense for which an arrest was authorized.⁵²

In some jurisdictions, however, if the offense charged is no offense at all, the process does not constitute a justification.⁵³ A case does not fall within this rule, where giving the language employed in the affidavit its ordinary signification the court may gather from it that an offense has been committed or attempted.⁵⁴

A party who does no more than present a complaint to a competent judicial officer is not liable, although that officer issues a warrant void on its face and an arrest is made thereunder,⁵⁵ but he has been held liable where his own fault combined with that of the magistrate contributed to the issuance of a void warrant.⁵⁶

If the judicial officer has jurisdiction over the subject matter of violations of municipal ordinances, complainant is not liable, even if it develops that the arrest was in fact wrongful because the ordinance for the violation of which he was arrested was invalid.⁵⁷ Exemption from liability has also been allowed where the statute under which the judicial officer acted was unconstitutional;⁵⁸ but the contrary ruling has also been made.⁵⁹

(b) In Civil Cases

Generally, a void writ or process in a civil case affords no justification; an irregular process is protection until it is set aside, but, when set aside, affords no protection, for acts done under it; an erroneously issued process or writ affords protection.

Although the courts have not been free from contrariety in their application, the underlying principles governing the liability of a complainant who secures an arrest or detention on civil process are by the weight of authority established as follows: (1) Where the writ or process under which plaintiff is detained is void, it furnishes no justification to the party securing it and he is liable in an action for false imprisonment without regard to whether or not the process has been set aside before the action is brought.⁶⁰ (2) Where the writ or process is irregular but is not absolutely void, an action will not lie until it is set aside, but, when it is set aside, it ceases to be a protection for acts done under it while it was in force.⁶¹ (3) Where the process is regularly issued in a case in which the court had jurisdiction, it constitutes a justification to the party securing its issuance for that which is done under it, although it was erroneously issued and may be set aside.⁶²

A party who merely files an affidavit for a capias and leaves the matter wholly in the hands of the justice to issue the writ or not as he sees fit, and who neither aids nor advises as to any future steps or action in the matter, is not liable to a person who may thereafter be arrested on a capias issued by the justice.⁶³ To afford protection to complainant

the process must be the result of a judicial, and not a ministerial, act;⁶⁴ and, if the act throughout is the act of the party and there is no judicial determination, the party is liable for a wrongful detention,⁶⁵ whether it was committed with or without malice.⁶⁶ A judgment will justify the acts of a party done under it while it is in force, if it is merely erroneous.⁶⁷

Decision as to jurisdiction. While it is sometimes broadly stated that the decision of the judicial officer as to the sufficiency of the showing made to him on which he issued his process will constitute a protection to complainant,⁶⁸ the determination of a judicial officer that he has jurisdiction will not confer jurisdiction on him when in fact he has no jurisdiction and process issued by him under such circumstances cannot be regarded as merely erroneous.⁶⁹

A complaint or affidavit is sufficient to confer jurisdiction when the proof presented, although slight and inconclusive, has a legal tendency to make out a proper case in all its parts for issuing process,⁷⁰ and is sufficient if it contains terms substantially equivalent to those of the statute,⁷¹ and although formalities in the execution of the complaint or preliminary proceedings have not been complied with;⁷² but, when there is a total defect of evidence as to any essential point, the complaint is not sufficient to confer jurisdiction,⁷³ and, where statutes require satisfactory evidence to be submitted to the judge before he is authorized to issue process, the process, to protect the party, should be founded on a complaint containing some legal evidence to sustain the cause for the arrest.⁷⁴

Prior proceedings irregular or erroneous. It is the general rule that it is incumbent on private persons, voluntarily causing the enforcement of a writ, to find a record that will support the process,⁷⁵ and it has been held that a person causing an arrest and imprisonment for debt is liable for damages unless there has been a strict compliance with the law giving the right to cause such arrest.⁷⁶ Thus a party has been held liable for an arrest pursuant to process procured by him without first making the affidavit required by statute to authorize its issuance in such a case,⁷⁷ or unless, as required by law, he duly files such affidavit with the magistrate,⁷⁸ or where he issues a process of arrest to which he is not entitled because an appeal was pending,⁷⁹ or in violation of a stay of proceedings,⁸⁰ or because it is issued after the lawful time limit,⁸¹ or because, although the record justifies its issuance, he is a mere stranger to the case without authority to issue it,⁸² or where process is procured in the name of a dead man,⁸³ or where process was issued after the judgment debtor had been discharged in bankruptcy,⁸⁴ or where the pendency of an action is a condition precedent to the legal right to issue an order of arrest, and he procures such an order made when no action is pending.⁸⁵

Liability has also been imposed where the arrested party was induced by fraud to come within the jurisdiction in which process was served,⁸⁶ and,

where a creditor obtains process of arrest purely to extort payment of a debt, from his debtor, liability has been imposed, such proceeding being an abuse of legal process on the part of the creditor.⁸⁷ Where the record justifies the issuance of process of arrest, the party is protected,⁸⁸ although the process itself contains irregularities.⁸⁹

Clear absence of jurisdiction. In the clear absence of all jurisdiction the party procuring process is liable,⁹⁰ as, for instance, where the court being in vacation was without authority to issue process,⁹¹ or lost jurisdiction of the case by an unauthorized adjournment thereof,⁹² or the process was issued by a judge, whereas the statute required it to be issued by the court.⁹³ A party has been held liable where he causes an arrest for a debt in a case where a statutory enactment provides that none shall be arrested for such a debt,⁹⁴ or brings about an arrest in the first instance where a statute provides that such arrest is lawful when the debtor has property to satisfy the debt,⁹⁵ or brings about the arrest of a female where statutory provisions prohibit the arrest of females,⁹⁶ or brings about the arrest of one as an absconding debtor where no statute authorizes an arrest on that ground.⁹⁷

Where the judicial officer issues process on his own initiative, without the direction of the party, the party cannot be held responsible,⁹⁸ and the question whether the party did order, direct, or instigate the detention should, if the facts are disputed, be left to the jury.⁹⁹ If, however, a party ratifies and adopts acts of the judicial officer done in the clear absence of jurisdiction, he becomes liable as if he had ordered them in the first instance.¹

Effect of malice or want of probable cause. If the case is such that the party obtaining process would not otherwise be liable, the fact that he procured it with malicious motives or in the absence of probable cause does not impose liability in this form of action,² nor is it important that he did not disclose all the material facts.³ On the other hand, although the party procuring process may have acted in good faith and without any wrong motive, if the process is wholly void, it forms no protection,⁴ although it may be considered on the question of malice to avoid exemplary damages.⁵

(c) Participation

A party obtaining process who participates in making an unlawful arrest or detention thereunder may be held liable for false imprisonment.

A party obtaining process incurs no liability unless he does something more than make a complaint before a judicial officer having jurisdiction over the general subject matter and person of the offender, by interfering and instigating the officer to enforce the process,⁶ nor is he liable for the acts of the officer in excess of his lawful authority, even if the arrest was under invalid process.⁷ If he does interfere and instigate the officer he is liable, where the process, although regular on its face and apparently good, is unauthorized, or was issued by a tribunal having no jurisdiction or acting beyond the scope of its power.⁸ A prosecutor of the pleas acting in his public capacity in delivering process to an officer and directing its service has been exempted from liability.⁹ A complainant may also be held liable if he takes part in bringing about a detention under process void on its face.¹⁰

What constitutes participation depends on the facts and circumstances of each case.¹¹ A complainant who participates in having an illegal warrant issued may be liable for false imprisonment thereunder,¹² as where he procures its issuance on a false statement that the prosecuting attorney desired its issuance,¹³ and liability was imposed where he forged the justice's name to a writ and thus caused a detention.¹⁴ It is not indispensable that the party be present at the time of the arrest.¹⁵ Even though the arrested party may have been originally arrested without the knowledge or consent of the party instigating it, nevertheless, if the detention is illegal and continues by the direction or with the advice or assistance of the party instigating it, liability is imposed.¹⁶

(2) Clerical Officers

A clerk of court cannot be held liable for the issuance of process in conformity with an order of the court or judicial officer having jurisdiction to order process to issue.

Where the court or judicial officer has jurisdiction to order process to issue, the clerk of court cannot be held liable if he issues process in conformity with such order.¹⁷ He may be responsible, however, if he assumes judicial power to issue process in a case where he does not possess such power.¹⁸ Where process is issued as a matter of course by the clerk on the application of a party, he is not liable where there is nothing on the records to show that its issuance is unlawful, but may be liable if he issues it contrary to law on facts within his knowledge.¹⁹

(3) Executive or Ministerial Officers

Process valid on its face issued by a court or judicial officer having apparent jurisdiction affords protection to the officer executing it, but generally he is not protected by the process where the court is without jurisdiction, or where the process is void on its face.

Process not void on its face issued by a judicial tribunal having general jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the person is a protection to the officer executing it.²⁰ The doctrine applies to courts of limited as well as general jurisdiction, if the subject matter of the suit appears to be within the jurisdiction of the court.²¹ The officer is not required to look beyond the writ to the validity and regularity of the proceedings on which it is founded²² or to exercise his judgment touching its validity in point of law.²³ His exemption from liability is unaffected by his actual knowledge of any invalidity or irregularity in such antecedent proceedings,²⁴ or by the fact that the process may have been obtained fraudulently,²⁵ or that his feelings toward the party arrested were malicious;²⁶ nor is exemption affected by the fact that the judicial officer issuing process committed an error in doing so,²⁷ or by notice of facts which might render the arrest improper.²⁸ The fact that the process was subsequently set aside does not nullify its protection to the officer.²⁹

If the judicial officer issuing the process has jurisdiction over the subject of violations of municipal ordinances, he is not liable, even if it turns out that the ordinance is invalid.³⁰ Process, which because of its having been issued irregularly by a party is not a protection to him, is nevertheless a protection to the officer executing it,³¹ and to those who assist him.³² If, however, the officer is a party to the issuance and service of process which is merely a sham to cover extortion or some purpose other than the prosecution of the alleged offender for an offense justifying arrest he is liable.³³ Accordingly, an arresting officer is not protected from liability for an illegal arrest and imprisonment by a warrant procured by him for an offense he knew had not been committed.³⁴

Court without jurisdiction. In cases where, although the process appears regular on its face, the judicial tribunal has in fact no jurisdiction the general rule is that the officer is not protected by the process;³⁵ other decisions modify this rule by holding the officer liable if he enforces process after notice of facts legally sufficient to establish lack of jurisdiction.³⁶ Likewise an officer has been held liable where he made the arrest under process issued pursuant to an unconstitutional statute.³⁷

Process void on face. The officer is not protected where the process is void on its face,³⁸ as where it does not disclose an offense known to the law,³⁹ or does not show the authority of the magistrate to issue it,⁴⁰ or discloses an offense over which the court has no jurisdiction,⁴¹ or shows that the crime attempted to be charged was not, in fact, committed,⁴² or where the proceedings show that they were instituted by one without legal authority to do so,⁴³ or that the right to arrest thereunder had expired through lapse of time,⁴⁴ or where a body writ, issued as a capias, discloses that it is based on a declaration stating a cause of action for which such remedy is not available.⁴⁵ The officer may refuse

Where the warrant was regular on its face and disclosed no want of jurisdiction in the magistrate who issued it, the officer who served the process could not be held for false imprisonment, although in fact the magistrate did not have jurisdiction.

45. Matters held immaterial

Where process under which arrest was made was void on its face, it was no protection to either officer making arrest or jail keeper, and neither failure of arresting officer to serve it in requisite time before return day, nor his failure to return it to magistrate, nor the waiver by plaintiff of his right to be committed to jail, were material on question of their liability for false imprisonment.

to execute process which is in fact void, although valid on its face, and no action will lie against him for such refusal,⁴⁶ and, a fortiori, may refuse to act under process substantially irregular on its face.⁴⁷

§ 29. Circumstances Attending and Following Arrest Affecting Legality

- a. In general
- b. Person arrested

a. In General

Circumstances attending or following a detention lawful in its inception may render it unlawful so as to impose liability for false imprisonment. On the other hand, an unlawful detention may be converted into a lawful one.

Circumstances attending or following a detention lawful in its inception may render it unlawful so as to impose liability for false imprisonment,⁴⁸ and, conversely, an unlawful detention may be converted into a lawful one so that liability for a false imprisonment exists only as to the period until the detention becomes lawful.⁴⁹ A valid arrest without a warrant for a felony does not become invalid on a showing by plaintiff that he was "booked" for a misdemeanor.^{49.5} The mere departure from the strict statutory method of making an arrest does not necessarily impose liability on an officer for false imprisonment.⁵⁰

A peace officer cannot justify an arrest on the ground that plaintiff was committing a breach of the peace where he provoked plaintiff into committing such breach of the peace.⁵¹ It has been questioned whether a detention of plaintiff by a private person can be justified where it was not followed by any criminal charge against him in any court.⁵²

Compliance with conditions or directions in process. One who fails to comply with the conditions or directions contained in the process may be held liable.⁵³

Exhibition of warrant or statement of authority. It has been held that no liability is incurred by a regular officer, having a warrant in his possession, because of his failure to exhibit it on demand,⁵⁴ particularly where the party arrested has knowledge of the charge.^{54.5} On the other hand, one who is not a regular officer may incur liability by failure so to exhibit his warrant.⁵⁵ The fact that a search warrant was in the arresting officer's coat a few feet away from him at the time of the search and arrest does not render him liable for false imprisonment.⁵⁶

In cases of arrest without process, failure to make known his authority and intention at the time of the arrest has been held an additional reason for imposing liability on the arresting person, and if he fails to make known his official position he occupies no better position than a private person arresting another without warrant.⁵⁷ An officer, however, is not liable for false imprisonment for failure to notify accused of his official capacity before making the arrest, when it is known to accused or when by the exercise of ordinary reason he should have known it.⁵⁸

A failure of an officer to conform to a statute providing that the person making the arrest must inform the person to be arrested of the intention to arrest him, of the cause of the arrest, and the authority to make it does not constitute false imprisonment.⁵⁹ Private persons apprehending an offender on fresh pursuit immediately after the commission of the act justifying his arrest need not advise him of the offense for which he is being arrested, since under such circumstances the person arrested knows the reason for his arrest.⁶⁰

Necessity of return of process. Process in order to justify an arrest should be regularly returned with a showing of substantial compliance with all its directions.⁶¹ It is generally held that there is no distinction between arrests under criminal process and those under civil process in this respect,⁶² but it has also been held that the failure of an officer to return a capias ad satisfaciendum into court did not bar his right to justify under the process.⁶³ Unless properly returned the process is not a protection to the officer executing it,⁶⁴ although the officer's failure in this regard will not prevent the process from being a protection to the person procuring it,⁶⁵ or to the officer's aids and servants.⁶⁶

The officer's return may not be amended after the jurisdiction of the court has lapsed,⁶⁷ but it seems that it may be while the proceeding is still before the court.⁶⁸

Place of arrest. In general an arrest is illegal and liability is incurred if made beyond the jurisdiction of the court issuing the process⁶⁹ or of the officer making the arrest.⁷⁰ Under some statutes, however, the making of an arrest by a sheriff in a county other than his own without a warrant will not of itself, and standing alone, render him liable for false imprisonment.⁷¹

It is generally held that an arrest without warrant of a person suspected of having committed a felony in another jurisdiction is not justified.⁷²

Subsequent conviction. Although there is authority to the contrary,⁷³ it is generally held that a subsequent conviction on the charge for which the arrest was made is a bar to an action for false imprisonment,⁷⁴ at least if the conviction was had in

In Michigan

(1) A judgment of conviction not appealed from has been held to be a complete defense to suit for false imprisonment.

Mich.—Turbessi v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 229 N.W. 454, 250 Mich. 110, 69 A.L.R. 1059.

a court having jurisdiction,⁷⁵ and in the absence of fraud or undue means.⁷⁶ A discharge by a magistrate on abandonment of the case by the prosecutor constitutes a "favorable termination" of the criminal proceedings so as to authorize recovery against the prosecutor for false imprisonment.⁷⁷ The dismissal of an indictment against accused after he has been found insane and ordered committed to an asylum does not constitute ground for liability for false imprisonment where a statute authorized a dismissal in furtherance of justice.^{77.5}

Effect of subsequent proceedings as showing reasonable grounds of suspicion justifying an arrest without a warrant is considered supra § 25. Waiver by plea of guilty is discussed infra §§ 45, 46.

Time of arrest. An arrest, whether pursuant to or without process, made at a time when it is not authorized, is not justified,⁷⁸ and needless night arrests, or arrests made on the eve of Sunday, when the ordinary resources of immediate deliverance are not at hand, have been held to be without decent support.⁷⁹

b. Person Arrested

Generally the arrest of a person incorrectly named, or the arrest of one not named in the process, constitutes false imprisonment; but it has been held that the arrest of a person bearing the identical name of the person named in the process can be justified, and that an arrest made on description can be justified by showing that the person making the arrest acted prudently.

The arrest of the person intended under process which states his name incorrectly will constitute a false imprisonment,⁸⁰ although there is some authority to the contrary,⁸¹ unless the name contained in the process is one by which he is customarily known⁸² or is a name which he has assumed.⁸³ The subsequent alteration of process, without the consent of the officer issuing it to correspond to the person's true name, does not render it a protection.⁸⁴ Statutes may, however, authorize the use of a fictitious name where the real name of the person to be arrested is unknown,⁸⁵ and statutes which authorize amendment of proceedings to conform to the arrested person's true name operate to justify an arrest under process containing a misnomer, if the proceedings are duly amended.⁸⁶

Person not named in process. The arrest of an innocent person whose name is not the one stated in the process cannot be justified,⁸⁷ although the one arresting makes an honest mistake in believing that

(2) There is, however, authority in Michigan to the contrary. Mich.—McCullough v. Greenfield, 95 N.W. 532, 133 Mich. 463, 62 L.R.A. 906, 1 Ann.Cas. 924.

In Oregon

(1) The text rule is now followed. Or.—McLean v. Sanders, 23 P.2d 321, 143 Or. 524, followed in Conrad v. Sanders, 23 P.2d 323, 143 Or. 531.

(2) Accordingly, plaintiff in false imprisonment action could not properly impeach municipal court's record of her conviction by testimony showing acquittal.

Or.—McLean v. Sanders, 23 P.2d 321, 143 Or. 524, followed in Conrad v. Sanders, 23 P.2d 323, 143 Or. 531.

(3) Where plaintiff's testimony showed nonexistence of record of plaintiff's conviction, pleaded by defendants, when false imprisonment action was instituted, and that plaintiff was discharged, plaintiff was entitled to opportunity to annul record directly.

Or.—McLean v. Sanders, 23 P.2d 321, 143 Or. 524, followed in Conrad v. Sanders, 23 P.2d 323, 143 Or. 531.

(4) It has been held in Oregon, however, that where defendant ejected plaintiff from its train, and had him arrested and imprisoned in the city jail for being drunk and drinking on its car, plaintiff's plea of guilty to a charge of being drunk had no conclusive effect in his subsequent civil action for his arrest.

Or.—Spain v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 153 P. 470, 78 Or. 355, Ann.Cas.1917E 1104.

75. Complaint

(1) If no formal complaint was actually made against plaintiff on his arrest for vagrancy, the magistrate's court acquired no jurisdiction to try or convict him.

Ariz.—Crowley v. Rummel, 195 P. 986, 22 Ariz. 179.

(2) Where the complaint charging a breach of the peace was good as against general demurrer, although defendant may have been entitled to compel the prosecution to specify details, proceedings and judgment based thereon are not absolutely void so as to afford no justification for the arrest.

Utah.—Olson v. Wall, 196 P. 1014, 58 Utah 20.

Jurisdiction of offense and person

Jurisdiction both of offense charged and of person of the plaintiff is essential to make an existing judgment of conviction a bar to recovery in an action for damages for false arrest and imprisonment.

he is arresting the right person;⁸⁸ but evidence of good faith is admissible in mitigation of damages.⁸⁹ It has been held, however, that where the description of the man wanted furnishes the officer with reasonable grounds to believe that the person arrested is the guilty person, he is protected in making the arrest and holding him for identification, although the one arrested is in fact innocent and is not named in the process.⁹⁰ An officer who neglects to exercise proper diligence in investigating the identity of the person arrested is, of course, liable for false imprisonment.⁹¹

Identity of name. If the person to be arrested is identified by name only, the one arresting must exercise due diligence in determining whether he bears the name of the person intended.⁹² If there are two men of the same name stated in the warrant and the officer arrests one who he knows is not the one intended, or he does not in good faith believe him to be so, the warrant is not a justification.⁹³

Some courts have held that the arrest of a person bearing the same name as the person intended can be justified by showing an honest belief that the one arrested was the one intended,⁹⁴ particularly if there is only one person by that name known to the officers or shown to exist.⁹⁵ In such case liability may nevertheless attach where a reasonable investigation would have established the fact that he was not the person intended,⁹⁶ or where the detention is prolonged after ascertaining that he is not the right person.⁹⁷ Other courts have, however, maintained that the arresting person acts at his peril, and cannot justify the arrest of the wrong person.⁹⁸ Refusal to release where investigation would have established innocence imposes liability.⁹⁹

Identity of description. A person making an arrest on description furnished him by another can justify by showing that he made such investigation as the circumstances permitted,¹ had reasonable grounds to suspect that the person arrested was the one intended,² and acted honestly and prudently in applying the description to him.³ It has been held, however, that defendant cannot justify on the ground that plaintiff answered the description of the person charged with crime, as such fact can go only in mitigation of damages.⁴

§ 30. — Duty to Take before Magistrate

Unreasonable delay in taking the person arrested before the magistrate constitutes false imprisonment.

One making an arrest may be liable in an action for false imprisonment where he fails to take the person arrested before the officer designated in the warrant, or, if the arrest is made without warrant, to the nearest committing magistrate, or other officer designated by law.⁵ Failure to perform this

Failure to arraign

Only justification for an arrest and only purpose for detention of a person are to initiate and insure a subsequent criminal prosecution in a court, and if there is no arraignment, the arresting officer is a trespasser ab initio and probable cause or justification for arrest is no protection to him.

N.Y.—Seguin v. Myers, 108 N.Y.S.2d 28, 279 App.Div. 690.

Most accessible magistrate

Under a statute requiring one arrested without an order to be immediately taken before the nearest magistrate, where one arrested without a warrant was taken before the most accessible, although not the nearest, magistrate, there was a sufficient compliance with the statute. Tex.—Corpus Juris cited in Haverbekken v. Hollingsworth, Civ.App., 250 S.W. 261, 265.

Not duty of prisoner

"The law imposes a mandatory duty upon an officer making an arrest without a warrant to without delay bring such person before a committing magistrate where he can be charged with the crime for which he was arrested by affidavit or complaint. This duty is not complied with on the part of the officer by taking the prisoner before the district attorney. And he must exercise reasonable diligence and put forth some effort in carrying out the mandate of the law. It is not the duty of the prisoner or his attorney to hunt up a magistrate. That duty is imposed upon the arresting officer."

Or.—Bowles v. Creason, 66 P.2d 1183, 1191, 156 Or. 278.

Power of inquisition

In connection with the duty of an arresting officer to produce his prisoner before the magistrate without undue delay, it has been said that arresting officers are not clothed by law with power of inquisition through duress.

W.Va.—Floyd v. Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co., 164 S.E. 28, 112 W.Va. 66.

"Public officers"

Under a statute providing that it is the duty of any private person, having arrested another for the commission of any public offense, to take him without unnecessary delay before a magistrate, servants of a corporation who arrested and imprisoned plaintiff without a warrant have been held private persons within statute, and not "public officers." Ala.—Caudle v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 182 So. 461, 236 Ala. 37.

Release and subsequent rearrest

Where a deputy sheriff arresting but failing to take before the proper tribunal, a prisoner who was released by the sheriff made no attempt to re-arrest her and take her before the magistrate until an action for assault and false imprisonment was commenced, his subsequent act in arresting and taking her before the magistrate did not defeat the action. Me.—Heffer v. Hunt, 112 A. 675, 120 Me. 10.

Termination of responsibility

Where officers, who were justified in making arrest, were sought to be held liable for false arrest and imprisonment, because of delay in taking plaintiff before magistrate after arrest, the responsibility of the arresting officers ceased when they delivered the prisoner to other officers whose duty it was to take plaintiff before magistrate.

Nev.—Lemel v. Smith, 187 P.2d 169, 64 Nev. 545.

To obtain legal warrant

(1) "The general rule is that a person who has been arrested without a warrant cannot lawfully be held in custody for a longer period than is reasonably necessary to obtain a legal warrant for his detention; and that where he is held for a longer period without such writ or other authority from a competent court he has a right of action for false imprisonment against the officer or person who made the arrest and those by whom he has been so unlawfully held in custody."

N.J.—Nelson v. Eastern Air Lines, 24 A.2d 371, 372, 128 N.J.Law 46.

(2) Under statute providing that officers shall arrest persons found violating law until legal warrant can be obtained, although liable in damages for oppressive acts, duty imposed on officer is co-extensive with common-law powers to make arrests without warrant for offenses committed in officer's presence, and failure to obtain warrant within reasonable time makes officer a trespasser ab initio and subjects him to civil liability therefor.

conduct.⁸ Some decisions have held that, in the case of an arrest without process, the arresting party should at once release him if satisfied of his innocence,⁹ or if the charge is dropped, unless the prisoner demands that he be brought before the magistrate;¹⁰ but other decisions have maintained that such release is not justified.¹¹

§ 31. — Delay and Prolonged Detention

Unreasonable delay in releasing a person and prolonged detention constitute false imprisonment.

It is well settled that unreasonable delay in releasing a person who is entitled to be released, or unreasonable delay in calling, taking him before, or turning him over to, the proper authorities constitutes false imprisonment.¹² Accordingly, the arresting party must bring his prisoner before the proper officer without a detention longer than is reasonably necessary,¹³ although, where the statute provides that in case of an arrest without a warrant the person arrested shall be forthwith carried before the most convenient magistrate of the county, it is improper to retain such person in jail until such time as he can be brought before some magistrate.¹⁴ Orders from a superior do not excuse the arresting party from fulfilling this duty, nor does delivery of the prisoner into the custody of another person;¹⁵ all those who take part in so detaining a person an unreasonable length of time are liable.¹⁶

It has been held that failure to take before a proper judicial officer without unnecessary delay imposes liability as a trespasser ab initio;¹⁷ but other courts have stated that liability is not that of a trespasser ab initio, unless the original arrest was made with the intent of being used for a subsequent wrong,¹⁸ and that liability commences only from the moment the detention is unreasonably prolonged.¹⁹ It has been held that liability attaches regardless of whether the arrested party was guilty of any crime.²⁰

Further liability may be imposed unless the arresting party takes his prisoner before the proper officer by the ordinary direct route, although an officer may be permitted to exercise some discretion in the route chosen.²¹ Even though the original arrest may have been lawful, a detention of the person arrested after the discovery of the fact that he is not the person sought constitutes false imprisonment.²² Of course plaintiff cannot take advantage of delays due to his own conduct.²³

What is a reasonable time depends on the facts of each case.²⁴ Prolonged detention must, however, be considered with regard, among other things, to such matters as judicial accessibility and facilities,²⁵ the unavoidable duties of the officer making the arrest,²⁶ the intervention of Sunday²⁷ or the intervention of a national or a legal holiday,²⁸ and the intoxication or mental condition of the person detained.²⁹ It is the duty of an officer, making an arrest without a warrant, on discovering the absence of the magistrate from his office, to place his prisoner in jail and make an effort to secure the attendance of the magistrate at his office.³⁰ Mere unavoidable delay in taking bail has been held not to impose liability.³¹

Where defendant unlawfully caused plaintiff's arrest and incarceration in jail, the tort is a continuing one, for the consequences of which defendant is liable until plaintiff is released.³²

Investigation or identification. Delay in bringing the person arrested before the magistrate or other proper officer cannot be justified by the fact that the delay was necessary in order to investigate the case and procure evidence against accused;³³ but a detention for a reasonable time to identify the prisoner is justified.³⁴ It is not the business of an officer making an arrest to take a prisoner against his will and without his consent before some self-constituted inquisitorial body, and, if he does so, all who participate in such unlawful detention are liable in damages.³⁵

§ 32. — Unnecessary Force, Hardship, Cruelty, or Indignity

Where the person making the arrest or detaining the person arrested imposes unnecessary force, hardship, cruelty, or indignity on the person arrested, he may be guilty of false imprisonment.

Liability in damages may be incurred by one who uses an undue amount of force in an arrest and detention,³⁶ or who subjects his prisoner to unnecessary hardships, cruel treatment, or indignities.³⁷ That amount of force will, however, be justified which does not exceed proper and rational bounds,³⁸ which must be judged by the circumstances attending the arrest and detention.³⁹ Damages in such cases ordinarily arise rather from a liability for assault and battery than for false imprisonment.⁴⁰ A person directing the arrest is liable for an assault committed by the arresting officer only if the officer in so doing is acting under his direction.⁴¹

Improper place of detention. Liability may also be incurred unless the arrested party is confined in a proper place,⁴² and confinement in an improper place imposes liability as a trespasser ab initio.⁴³ The arresting person may adopt such usual measures as may be necessary for the safe-keeping of the prisoner,⁴⁴ and, it seems, must have a reasonable discretion as to where the place shall be within his jurisdiction.⁴⁵ Where a statute fixes the proper place of detention, all those concerned in a detention at an improper place are equally liable.⁴⁶ The person instigating the arrest is not, however, responsible for the illegal act of the officer in this regard.⁴⁷

A statute providing that a defendant during the periods of adjournment of the examination if he fail to give bail shall, during such adjournment, be confined in the county jail does not render officers guilty of false imprisonment who confine one in a city prison during the time between his arrest and examination, where he has been arrested by city officers under a warrant issued by the police judge of the city.⁴⁸

§ 33. — Refusal to Accept or Procure Bail

A refusal to accept proper bail or to afford a reasonable opportunity to procure bail, where the arrested person is entitled to be released on bail, may constitute false imprisonment.

A failure to discharge on tender of proper bail renders the officer whose duty it is to do so liable;⁴⁹ but mere unavoidable delay in taking bail does not, it seems, constitute false imprisonment.⁵⁰ Since it is the duty of an arresting officer, in a proper case, to afford the person arrested an opportunity to give bond, if he wrongfully denies him such opportunity his imprisonment thereafter becomes unlawful and constitutes false imprisonment.⁵¹ However, an arresting officer has been held not chargeable in false imprisonment for the period of plaintiff's confinement occasioned by the refusal of the magistrate to accept bail and release plaintiff.^{51.5}

Where the person instigating the arrest directs or causes the officer to refuse proper bail, he is liable,⁵² and where the person causing plaintiff's arrest induced, by false representations, the bondsmen on plaintiff's bail bond to withdraw from the bond with the result that plaintiff was compelled to remain in jail, such person is liable in damages to plaintiff.⁵³ In the absence of a statute to the contrary, no obligation rests on the party making an arrest to conduct accused in search of bail.⁵⁴ A person, having given proper bail, has the absolute right to be at large, and the officer who rearrests him in disregard of his rights is liable.⁵⁵

§ 34. — Detention after Acquittal or Expiration of Term

Detention of a prisoner after the expiration of his sentence or term of commitment may constitute false imprisonment.

One who unlawfully detains a prisoner after the expiration of his sentence or term of commitment may be liable for false imprisonment.⁵⁶ It has been held that the person who instigated the arrest cannot be held liable for neglecting to give instructions for the arrested person's discharge when for any reason he becomes entitled to it, the duty of procuring his discharge under such circumstances devolving on the arrested person himself.⁵⁷ Also, in an action for false imprisonment against the prison official, plaintiff is barred from recovering, even though he was detained beyond the term of his sentence, where the official detained plaintiff pursuant to the terms of a commitment valid on its face.⁵⁸ A sheriff who has in his custody a prisoner who has been regularly and legally committed to his custody is not liable for damages in an action for false imprisonment where it appears that the grand jury on an investigation of the charge has returned a "no bill," but before the court, or its authorized officer, has directed him to discharge the prisoner.⁵⁹

§ 35. Arrest on One Ground, Justification on Another

Ordinarily a person making an arrest on one ground cannot justify the arrest on another ground.

If an arrest without process is made on one ground, on which it subsequently develops it cannot be sustained, the arrest cannot later be justified on the theory that another ground existed at the time of the arrest,⁶⁰ even though such offense is 25 C.J. p 496 note 21.

Detention pending review

Where writ of habeas corpus by convict claiming to have completed servitude was dismissed, and convict remanded to custody of warden, warden was not guilty of false imprisonment in holding prisoner pending review of case, although judgment of trial court was erroneous and was reversed, since the judgment of the trial court was in the nature of a warrant issued by a judicial officer having jurisdiction, and there was no evidence of bad faith by the warden, although the issue of good faith was made.

Ga.—Teasley v. Nelson, 148 S.E. 534, 39 Ga.App. 773.

Drunken prisoner

Refusal of town marshal to discharge from custody, on verbal order of police judge in a drug store, a prisoner who had been lawfully arrested for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, was not ground for recovery by prisoner against marshal for false imprisonment, where arrest was made about dark, since under the statute marshal had duty to keep prisoner in custody until morning, "night" being defined as the beginning of darkness; nightfall.

Ky.—Bailey v. Shrader, 97 S.W.2d 575, 265 Ky. 663.

Arrest on parole board warrants

Where parole board warrants for arrest of claimant merely directed that prisoner be retaken and returned to the custody of warden, warden in receiving prisoner was required to look to the basic judgment and statute under which it was given to determine how long to hold prisoner, and state could not be protected from liability for arrest and detention beyond period authorized by law on ground of the quasi-judicial nature of the determination of delinquency and warrants for detention by the parole board.

N.Y.—Williams v. State, 172 N.Y.S.2d 206, 5 A.D.2d 936.

Rearrest

Where plaintiff arrested on suspicion of vagrancy was confined in jail of city of which defendant was mayor, and charges were dropped by arresting city at time when plaintiff was out on temporary release granted by defendant, subsequent rearrest and confinement of plaintiff at time when plaintiff had failed to produce record showing that charge had been dropped, did not constitute false imprisonment, even if defendant was not to be regarded as surety, for plaintiff's custody, and therefore justified in having him reincarcerated.

Warden

Wardens were merely administrative employees acting in pursuance of writs and orders valid on their face, and could not be held liable for false imprisonment because of prisoner's confinement after allowances for good time had been forfeited, nor could director of department of public safety be held liable, in view of fact that he did not trespass on his discretionary authority by arbitrary action.

U.S.—Uryga v. Ragen, C.A.Ill., 181 F.2d 660.

59. Mere statement of attorney for prisoner to jailer that prisoner should be discharged because grand jury had returned no bill was not sufficient proof of return or such notice as to be conclusive on jailer, so as to require jailer to act immediately at his peril, but jailer would be entitled to reasonable time for further inquiry before taking action, if charged with duty of making further inquiry by such notice.

Existence of legal grounds

(1) Where person, who had been allegedly illegally parked in no parking zone of park, was arrested for disorderly conduct although he was not guilty of that offense, arresting officers were guilty of false arrest, even if they could legally have arrested person for illegal parking or other offenses mentioned in municipal code.

Mich.—Donovan v. Guy, 80 N.W.2d 190, 347 Mich. 457.

(2) Fact that deputy sheriff who stopped plaintiff, in action for false imprisonment, and brought him before justice of the peace could have arrested plaintiff for violation of state law did not excuse him, where he suggested that justice of peace try plaintiff under a nonexistent village ordinance for driving on wrong side of street.

N.M.—Vickrey v. Dunivan, 279 P.2d 853, 59 N.M. 90.

Fire marshal

Where a fire marshal held witnesses in custody and permitted no communication with them under the erroneous belief that he was empow-

intimately connected in time and place.⁶¹ In some jurisdictions a person or officer who unlawfully arrests another without authority may properly detain him on a subsequent valid process,⁶² but in other jurisdictions it is held that he must first restore such party to his liberty before he may detain him on a subsequent valid process.⁶³ When, however, an arrest without process has been made on more than one ground and is justified on one ground, this is a sufficient justification.⁶⁴

When a single act constitutes more than one crime, the person making the arrest may justify the arrest on the ground of any offense established by the act.⁶⁵ Similarly, where detention is under two writs, one legal and the other illegal, the fact that one is illegal does not affect the character of the imprisonment, and the one arrested sustains no damage,⁶⁶ and this is so although the officer declares that he made the arrest under the illegal process.⁶⁷ A person or officer who unlawfully arrests another without authority cannot justify the act under subsequent valid process.⁶⁸

A police officer having made an illegal arrest without warrant cannot subsequently justify on the ground that a legal warrant was outstanding, if he acted without having had it or even without knowledge of its existence.⁶⁹ It has been held that, where a warrant which proves invalid has been issued, the arresting person may justify by showing that the facts authorized an arrest without warrant;⁷⁰ but the authorities are at variance on this point, some decisions maintaining that the person making the arrest cannot apprehend a person under a warrant, and, if it subsequently develops that the arrest cannot be sustained on that ground, justify on the theory that the arrest was proper without a warrant,⁷¹ especially if the other ground for arrest was not known to the arresting person at the time he made it.⁷²

Where it appears that the officer was acting by virtue of a warrant, and no claim is made to the contrary in the pleadings or evidence, the fact that the arrest might have been justified without warrant is immaterial.⁷³ It has been held that an arrest by a deputy or inferior officer may be justified by showing that valid process existed in the hands of the superior officer, although the process was not in the deputy's possession when he made the arrest,⁷⁴ or although he held another process which proved to be invalid, and did not know of the existence of the valid writ in his superior's hands and expressly declared that he made the arrest under the invalid process.⁷⁵

A process valid on its face protects the officer serving it, notwithstanding the prosecutor elects to prosecute on a different warrant from that on which the arrest is made,⁷⁶ and this rule has been applied for the protection of an officer who arrests for an offense committed in his presence.^{76.5}

III. PERSONS RESPONSIBLE

§ 36. In General

Generally, in order for a person to be liable for a false imprisonment, he must have participated in or caused the wrongful arrest or detention either by direct act or indirect procurement.

In so far as the status and relation of the various ered by statute to do so, in an action for false imprisonment he could not justify his conduct by showing that the persons so held were subject to legal arrest on other grounds. Wis.—Geldon v. Finnegan, 252 N.W. 369, 213 Wis. 539.

parties to the act are factors in determining the unlawfulness of a restraint or detention, many questions concerning the persons who may be held liable in an action for false imprisonment have been considered supra §§ 14-35, in connection with the discussion of the unlawfulness of the restraint or detention.

However, as a general rule, in order that one may be liable for a false imprisonment, it must appear that he personally participated therein by direct act or by indirect procurement,⁷⁷ or, in other words, he must be shown to have been the legal cause of the wrongful detention.⁷⁸ Responsibility for false imprisonment cannot be based on mere negation or failure to speak, but only on some affirmative act instigating thereto.⁷⁹ Stated conversely, the one responsible, whether as principal or agent, for a legally unjustifiable arrest or detention is generally liable therefor.⁸⁰

Arrests without warrant by peace officers see supra § 22.

"It does indeed go without saying that an official, who is in fact guilty of using his powers to vent his spleen upon others, or for any other personal motive not connected with the public good, should not escape liability for the injuries he may so cause; and, if it were possible in practice to confine such complaints to the guilty, it would be monstrous to deny recovery. The justification for doing so is that it is impossible to know whether the claim is well founded until the case has been tried, and that to submit all officials, the innocent as well as the guilty, to the burden of a trial and to the inevitable danger of its outcome, would dampen the ardor of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible, in the unflinching discharge of their duties. Again and again the public interest calls for action which may turn out to be founded on a mistake, in the face of which an official may later find himself hard put to it to satisfy a jury of his good faith. There must indeed be means of punishing public officers who have been truant to their duties; but that is quite another matter from exposing such as have been honestly mistaken to suit by anyone who has suffered from their errors."

§ 38. — Instigating and Directing Others

Persons legally causing an unlawful arrest by instigation or direction are liable therefor.

One who is the legal cause of an unlawful arrest or detention, because he commands or instigates another to do the wrong, is responsible,⁹⁷ and this is so, although he does not know that the arrest was illegal.⁹⁸ Parties instigating the arrest or detention may also be liable for acts done by others in pursuance of an illegal object or enterprise in which they have all engaged,⁹⁹ although the immediate actors are unknown to them or have no other connection with them than by the unlawful acts committed, intended to effectuate the original object.¹ On the other hand, one instigating another's arrest on a felony charge cannot be held responsible for the arresting officer's subsequent conduct, in the

§ 40(1). Liability of Principal for Acts of Agent

The liability of a principal for a wrongful restraint or detention by an agent or employee depends on whether the act was authorized or subsequently ratified or whether the act was within the scope of the agent's or employee's employment or authority.

The liability of an alleged principal or employer for a false arrest or imprisonment by an agent or employee is determined by rules of agency, discussed generally in Agency §§ 254-261, and Master and Servant §§ 561-575, rather than by any rule peculiar to the law of false imprisonment.⁵ Thereunder the liability of a principal or employer for the act of his agent or employee depends on whether the principal authorized or subsequently ratified the act, or whether the act was within the scope of the agent's or employee's employment or authority,⁶ and whether the employee committed the tort in, and as a part of, the transaction of the business of the employer.^{6.5}

Accordingly, the principal is liable for an unlawful arrest or detention made or caused by his servant or agent acting within the scope of his express or implied authority,⁷ and in furtherance of the employer's business,⁸ or in protecting the principal's property in line with a duty imposed on him so to do, as discussed infra § 40(4). To hold the principal liable, the injured person must establish that the relationship existed,⁹ that the servant or agent actually caused or participated in the illegal restraint,¹⁰ and that he acted within the scope of his authority either implied or express, or that the act was ratified by the principal.¹¹

Independent contractor. It has been held that where the person employed stands in the relation of independent contractor to the employer, the latter exercising no control over the activities of the former, the employer will not be responsible or liable for a false imprisonment caused by the employee.¹² Thus a collection agency employed to

Ratification. The principal may become liable if he or his duly authorized agent ratifies the act of his agent in the making or causing of a wrongful arrest.¹⁴ However, to establish a ratification by an agent it must appear that the act of ratification by such agent was within the scope of his authority, express or implied.¹⁵

Principal exonerated, if agent exonerated. The principal when sued because of an alleged wrongful detention by his agent may prove in justification that the agent could not have been liable,¹⁶ or has been released.¹⁷ Liability may, however, be imposed if it is established that the principal was the legal cause of the detention, independent of the acts of the agent.¹⁸

§ 40(2). — Scope of Authority or Employment

What comes within the scope of authority or employment may depend on the character of the employment, and authority to detain may be implied from the employer's relation to the principal and the mode in which he is permitted to act or conduct the business.

Where the authority given the agent to detain another is express, the principal is responsible if the detention is wrongful.¹⁹ In the absence of such express authority, the character of the employment is an important consideration in determining whether the agent's misconduct was within the scope of his authority or employment.²⁰ Hence, although, broadly speaking, arresting or causing the arrest of persons is not an incident of business committed to subordinate agents or employees, or in the line or scope of their employment, unless such authority is conferred expressly or by implication from acquiescence in a known course of conduct,²¹ authority of an agent or employee to detain another

Clerk

(1) Corporation operating drug store was not liable to customer in action for false arrest, because clerk at cigar stand in drug store followed customer outside drug store, accused him of stealing two cigars, and had policeman search the customer, since clerk had no implied authority to go out of store and prefer charges against customer and cause the customer to be searched.

may be implied from his relation to the principal, the nature of his employment, and the mode in which he is permitted to act or conduct the business.²²

Liberality toward complainant is exercised in determining the scope of the agent's authority and the liability of the principal.²³

§ 40(3). — Effect of Breach of Instructions, Negligence, Malice, Etc., of Employee

The principal is liable for a wrongful restraint or detention by an agent or employee within the scope of his employment or authority even though the act was contrary to express instructions, and even though the agent or employee was guilty of negligence or of malicious conduct.

(2) Where store clerk had been instructed never to accuse or arrest a customer and clerk followed customer down street over a block and then summoned police officer and accused customer of theft from store, clerk was not acting within scope of his employment and store was not liable for false imprisonment. § 40(4). — Employees in Charge of or Protecting Business or Property

The principal is liable for a wrongful detention by an agent or employee intrusted with his business or property to protect or recover it, but not if merely to punish an alleged offender.

An agent or employee, intrusted with property, has implied authority to do all things necessary to protect such property³² except, it is sometimes held, to do things which the employer himself could not lawfully do.³³ Hence, the principal has been held responsible in numerous cases on the ground that the agent acted within the scope of his authority where the arrest or detention is made or caused by an agent who is intrusted with the care and custody of the principal's business, and property, and the arrest or detention arises out of his efforts to protect the business or protect or recover the property of the principal,³⁴ or to protect the employer's servants.³⁵ This is so even if it is necessary to follow the alleged wrongdoer off the premises of the employer.³⁶

However, there is no implied authority in one having charge or custody of the principal's business or property to take such steps as he thinks fit merely to punish a person suspected or guilty of a past offense with respect to the property.³⁷

Arrest on suspicion

"It cannot be presumed, that a master, by intrusting his servant with his property, and conferring power upon him to transact his business, thereby authorizes him to do any act for its protection that he could not lawfully do himself if present. The master would not, if present, be justified in arresting, detaining, and searching a person upon suspicion, however strong, of having stolen his goods, and secreted them upon his person. The authority of the defendants to the superintendent could not, therefore, be implied from his employment. Hence, the principal is held not liable for the act of an agent, where, although intrusted with the business or property, the offense against the business has already been committed or the property has been taken from his custody, so that an arrest or criminal proceeding cannot be said to be necessary for its preservation, but, on the contrary, is merely to punish the offender or vindicate justice.³⁸

If the employee intrusted with the care of the business or property goes beyond or outside his employment in making or causing an arrest, the employer is not liable,³⁹ nor is the principal liable where the agent steps aside from his employment and makes an arrest for his own purposes and ends.⁴⁰

Persons not intrusted with business or property. The principal is exonerated, in many instances, where the agent is not such a one as is intrusted with the care and custody of the principal's business and property.⁴¹

§ 40(5). — Detectives

Detectives employed for the purpose of protecting the principal's property and ferreting out and prosecuting persons guilty of offenses against the principal act within their authority in causing the arrest or detention of such alleged offenders, but this is not so generally as to detectives employed merely to ascertain the facts and report thereon.

The mere fact that one is employed under the appellation "detective" does not necessarily import that he has authority to make an arrest or cause a detention.⁴³ Thus the mere employment of a detective to ascertain and report facts about an offense concerning the employer's business or property does not render the employer liable for an arrest made by the detective for the purpose of ascertaining whether the person arrested was implicated therein,⁴⁴ although if, in an effort to obtain information as part of the investigation which the employer directed him to make, the detective detains a person against his will for questioning, the employer is liable therefor.⁴⁵

However, the employment of a detective under such limited authority is totally different from a case wherein the agent is charged with the duty of preserving the property of the principal and in an attempt to do so causes the arrest of a third party on a charge of interfering or making away with the principal's property.⁴⁶ It must, therefore, be shown that the detective in making the arrest acted within the scope of his authority,⁴⁷ and, in general, persons employed for the purpose of protecting the property of, and ferreting out and prosecuting parties guilty of offenses against, the principal are held to act within the scope of their authority when they arrest or cause the arrest or detention of persons alleged to be offenders against their principal.⁴⁸

If the arrest or detention comes after the offense was committed, detention or punishment of the offender being the object rather than protection or recovery of the property, the principal is not liable therefor.⁴⁹ So, where the arrest is not made for an offense having any connection with the preservation of the employer's business or property, it does not fall within the detective's implied authority, so as to render the employer liable.⁵⁰

Railroad detective

(1) Railroad is liable for an arrest without probable cause by a detective employed to protect its property, it being within the scope of the agency of such an employee to discover perpetrators of crime against the property in order to recover the same and to procure the arrest of supposed offenders.

U.S.—Director General of Railroads v. Kastenbaum, N.Y., 44 S.Ct. 52, 263 U.S. 25, 68 L.Ed. 146.

(2) Thus, railroad is liable for injuries inflicted by its detectives, when mistakenly arresting an innocent man, instead of the men doing or threatening to do injury to railroad property, the mistake amounting to negligence.

U.S.—Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Pittinger, C.C.A.N.J., 293 F. 853.

(3) Also, where captain of railroad's police department received information concerning improper selling of railroad tickets and assigned railroad detective to investigate, and the captain presented statement obtained in investigation to municipal police officer who sent one of his policemen and the captain to see the prosecuting attorney who read the statement and filled out an information which the municipal court judge signed, and the municipal police officer and the railroad detective went to the railroad station and each grasped an arm of the ticket collector and marched him outside the station and took him in police automobile to police station house, the railroad, through its employees, was an active participant at every phase of the proceeding so as to be liable for false arrest and imprisonment of ticket collector.

U.S.—Burke v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., C.A.N.Y., 267 F.2d 894.

(4) However, it has been held that the mere employment of detective by railroad to protect property and get information does not give him real or apparent authority to make arrest in behalf of railroad.

§ 40(6). — Employees Also Public Officers

- a. In general
- b. Special policemen

a. In General

The principal is not liable for a wrongful arrest or detention by an employee who is also a public officer when performing his duties as a public officer.

A principal is not liable for any error or wrongful act of an agent or employee who is also a public officer, and who in making or causing an arrest or detention acts in performance of his public functions, since in such a case the agent or employee acts for the state and not for his employer.⁵³

b. Special Policemen

The principal is liable for a wrongful arrest by an agent or employee who is also a special police officer under public authority only when the officer acts as his agent, and not when he acts as a public officer.

A person nominated and paid by a private individual or corporation, but commissioned by public authority, pursuant to statutory provisions to serve as a special peace officer, sometimes acts in making arrests as a servant of the party nominating and paying him, and sometimes in a public capacity as a servant of the state.⁵⁴ The fact that his salary is paid by the one who nominated him does not make him the mere servant of the one who pays him,⁵⁵ or affect his status as that of a police officer,⁵⁶ nor does the fact that he may be divested of his powers by the one nominating him,⁵⁷ or may be more diligent in making arrests for offenses committed on the premises or against the property of the party paying him.⁵⁸

To hold the employer liable it must be shown that the arrest was instigated by the employer and was made by the special officer as agent of the employer and not solely on his volition as a peace officer,⁵⁹ the employer being liable only for an arrest made in defending or preserving his property, and not for one made in vindication of justice or for an injury not done to the employer.⁶⁰ Thus it has been

"The general rule is that, in the absence of statute, a private person or corporation is not responsible for the acts of a special police officer, appointed by public authority, but employed and paid by the private person or corporation, when the acts complained of are performed in carrying out his duty as a public officer. But where he is acting in performance of the duties for which he is employed, or his movements are actively directed by his employer, in other words, where he represents his employer and not the public, such employer may become liable for his acts."

Mass.—Zygmuntowicz v. American Steel & Wire Co. of New Jersey, 134 N.E. 385, 387, 240 Mass. 421.

held that the principal is not liable where the officer arrests another on a charge of assault,⁶¹ disorderly conduct,⁶² carrying concealed weapons,⁶³ picketing,⁶⁴ larceny committed on employer's premises,⁶⁵ especially where the property stolen did not belong to the employer,⁶⁶ or violation of traffic laws.⁶⁷

On the other hand, liability has been imposed where it appears that the special police officer in making the arrest was acting within the express terms of authority given him by his employer,⁶⁸ or in the course and scope of his duties toward his employer the statutes under which the special officer was appointed sometimes so providing,⁶⁹ or where the acts of the special police officer are in excess of his authority as an officer.^{69.5}

Ratification. The act of a special policeman in making an arrest cannot be ratified so as to render his employer liable where the policeman acts in the matter as an agent of the state and not of the employer.^{69.10}

Place of arrest as factor. Liability has been imposed on the employer for a false arrest by the special police officer acting in the course of his duties to such employer, although the arrest was not made on the employer's premises.⁷⁰ However, it has been said that, if such an officer makes an arrest on the premises of his employer or in protecting his property, the employer will be required to assume the burden of showing that it was not within the scope of his authority,⁷¹ whereas the fact that the arrest was not made on the premises of the employer has been mentioned as an element indicating that he was not acting as agent for his employer,⁷² especially where his duties were, by the authority appointing him, confined to the employer's premises.⁷³ On the other hand, it has been held that

Lockup on employer's premises

Company which had constructed lockup on its property, due to distance from county jail, was not liable for plaintiff's wrongful incarceration therein by its employee in line of his official duty as deputy sheriff, under warrant issued by duly qualified justice of peace on complaint of citizen of county, in which company did not participate.

the fact that the arrest was made on the employer's premises is immaterial.⁷⁴

Participation by other employee. If the unlawful arrest is instigated, procured, or participated in by another employee of the principal acting within the scope of his authority, liability therefor is imposed because of the action of such other employee.⁷⁵ However, even if the unlawful arrest by a special officer was instigated by the principal's employees so as to render the principal liable, the principal would not be liable for a subsequent wanton and malicious assault on the prisoner by the officer, such assault not having been instigated or assented to by the principal's employees.⁷⁶

§ 40(7). — Regular Policemen

Ordinarily one is not liable for acts of a police officer making a wrongful arrest in the line of his duties as a public officer, even though stationed on private property for the protection of life and property.

A regular police officer performing his functions as such at the request of private person is at most a special agent, for whose wrongful acts in making an arrest such private person is not responsible.⁷⁷ So a regular policeman, stationed on private property to arrest offenders and protect life and property, but receiving instructions from, and reporting to, the police authorities, is not regarded as being in the employ of the owner of the property on which he is stationed, although such owner may pay a part of his salary,⁷⁸ and the owner is not ordinarily responsible for arrests made by him.⁷⁹ On the other hand, by responding to the invitation of the owner, or his authorized agent, to aid in enforcing private regulations, the officer becomes a special agent for that purpose, and for his conduct, within the scope of the authority conferred, the owner is responsible,⁸⁰ although if, while he is enforcing such private regulations, the party whom he is dealing with commits an offense justifying arrest, the officer in arresting him is presumed to have acted in his public capacity.⁸¹

§ 40(8). — Corporate Principal

As a general rule, a corporation may be held liable for a wrongful restraint or detention by its officers, agents, or employees acting within the scope of their employment or authority, or if their acts have been expressly authorized or ratified by an officer having the general management of the corporation's affairs or standing as the alter ego of the corporation.

As noted in Corporations § 1276, an action for false imprisonment may be maintained against a private corporation for an illegal arrest made or caused by its agent or employee acting within the general scope of his employment, in the same manner as in the case of natural persons, and this is true, even though the act was not previously authorized or subsequently ratified, and even though the injury was inflicted willfully or maliciously, and despite the fact that the act is beyond the object of the corporation's creation.⁸² If the acts of

It has been said, however, that employees and subordinate officers of a private corporation have no implied authority to engage in the apprehension and prosecution of persons suspected of crime involving loss to the corporation,⁸⁴ except where arrest is made for the protection of the principal's property in his charge, or in connection with its recovery, or to prevent the crime at the time of its commission.⁸⁵ It is only such officers as have the general management of the corporation's affairs that have such implied powers.⁸⁶ Only one vested with the corporate power in such a sense that he is the alter ego of the corporation as regards such proceedings can bind the corporation for such tort or ratify it after commission.⁸⁷ In order that a subordinate officer may have such power, he must have a duty to protect the corporate property,⁸⁸ or his authority must be such that, in the ordinary and usual discharge of his duties, it may reasonably be implied that he has been given such power.⁸⁹

(a) Employees in Charge of Transportation

A carrier is liable for a wrongful detention of a passenger caused by employees in charge of a train or other transportation facilities, at least while engaged in protecting the business, property, or passengers in his care.

Where the relation of carrier and passenger exists, many decisions impose a stringent rule of liability for tortious acts of the carrier's employees in charge of the duty to transport the passenger safely, and hold that a passenger is entitled to protection against such employee's act in causing an unlawful detention without reference to whether such act was connected with the performance of a duty within the scope of his employment.⁹⁰

Liability of carrier for wrongful acts

Other cases, however, have not stated that the liability of the carrier for a wrongful arrest by its employees is absolute, irrespective of the scope of his authority, but have gone no further than to say that it is well settled that when one in charge of a train or other transportation facilities, while engaged in protecting the business, property, or passengers in his care, causes the detention of a passenger the carrier is responsible.⁹¹ For instance, it has been held that he acts within the scope of his employment in causing the unlawful detention of a passenger on his train for participating in an affray⁹² or an assault,^{92.5} or on the ground of disorderly conduct on the car or premises,⁹³ or intoxication,⁹⁴ or for nonpayment of fare,⁹⁵ or for attempting to ride on an allegedly invalid transfer ticket,⁹⁶ or because he tenders a supposed counterfeit coin in payment of fare,⁹⁷ although there are decisions holding that the act of causing the arrest of a passenger on the charge of passing counterfeit money in payment of fare is beyond the scope of the implied authority of the carrier's employees, so that the carrier is not responsible.⁹⁸ Of course, if the agent is acting entirely beyond the scope of his authority and purely to effect a purpose in which the carrier has no interest, his act does not impose liability on the carrier.⁹⁹

The assault, ejection, and arrest of a passenger are frequently regarded as a series of acts constituting one continued tort,¹ but there are decisions holding that after ejecting a passenger the subsequent act of causing his arrest is beyond the scope of the employee's authority.²

Joint employees

Where a contract between a bridge district and a traction company provided that the district employ collectors of the bridge fares for the benefit of both, the expenses to be divided, the collectors were the serv-

Regulations respecting transfer tickets

A reasonable regulation cannot protect a carrier against the mistakes of its own agents which result in an invasion of a passenger's rights; otherwise all that would be necessary for a carrier to do would be to regulate a given subject, and then shield itself behind such regulation when called to account for an infringement of the rights of its passengers.

of transportation depends on whether the wrong was committed while the employee was acting within the scope of his employment.

In the case of employees not intrusted by the carrier with duties with respect to the execution of the contract of transportation or who do not have the duty of protecting the passenger, the rule of strict liability is relaxed and the carrier is not liable unless the detention is caused by the employee while acting within the scope of his employment.³ In such case if the employee acts to protect the business or property of the carrier, the detention is within the scope of his employment and the carrier is liable,⁴ whereas if the offense is past and the arrest merely to vindicate justice, the employee is not acting within the scope of his employment and the carrier is not liable.⁵ An element to be considered is whether the carrier had any interest in the matter.⁶

(c) Employees Also Special Police Officers

The fact that the employee is also a special police officer does not in itself preclude liability on the part of the carrier.

Where statutory provisions provide that conductors in charge of trains or others in charge of transportation facilities shall have all the powers of peace officers or conservators of the peace, nevertheless if the arrest is made or caused within the scope of their authority as employees of the carrier, liability is imposed, the statutes themselves sometimes so providing.⁷ However, the carrier is not responsible if the arrest or detention is not made to protect the company's property, business, or passengers, but to fulfill a duty imposed by the state, unless the arrest was expressly authorized or subsequently ratified.⁸

(d) Strangers or Police Officers

The carrier is liable for a wrongful arrest of a passenger by third persons, not regular policemen empowered to make such arrest, which its agents could have prevented by the exercise of due diligence.

A carrier may be liable for an illegal arrest of a passenger made by others which its agents in the exercise of due diligence under the circumstances could have prevented,⁹ although no obligation rests on the carrier or on its servants in charge of the transportation facilities to prevent an arrest by an officer duly empowered to make such arrest.¹⁰ Liability has, however, been imposed where the carrier's employee acting within the scope of his employment assists an officer in making an arrest in an unlawful manner,¹¹ instigates the arrest,^{11.5} or requests such officer to make the unlawful arrest.¹²

(e) Express Authority and Ratification

The carrier is responsible for a wrongful arrest by an employee which it expressly authorizes or subsequently ratifies.

Liability for an unlawful arrest may be imposed on a carrier if its express instructions to its employees are such that they can be interpreted to authorize them to cause arrests,¹³ or where it subsequently ratifies a wrongful arrest.¹⁴

b. Persons Losing or without Status as Passengers

Where the person wrongfully detained is not a passenger, or has lost his status as such, the carrier is liable only if the agents or employees causing the detention were acting within the scope of their employment or authority.

Although the relation of carrier and passenger has terminated, the carrier is responsible for a detention caused by an employee while acting within the scope of his authority.¹⁵ It is otherwise if the act of causing the detention is beyond the scope of the employee's authority.¹⁶

Similarly, where the relationship of carrier and passenger is not established, the carrier is responsible where it is established that a wrongful arrest was caused by an employee while acting within the scope of his authority,¹⁷ and the cases frequently apply as a test the general rule that if the detention is caused to protect the business or property of the carrier the act is within the scope of the employee's authority and the carrier is liable,¹⁸ whereas if the arrest is caused for a past offense or to vindicate justice the act is not within the scope of the employee's authority, and the carrier is not responsible.¹⁹

§ 40(10). — Partners

A partnership and all of its members are liable for a wrongful detention caused by one of the partners in the scope of the partnership business, or in which they all participate.

The liability of a partnership or of the partners therein for an illegal arrest or detention made or caused by one of the partners depends on the doctrine of principal and agent,²⁰ and the general rule is that, although a willful tort of one partner is not to be imputed to the firm,²¹ nevertheless liability may be imposed if the tort is within the scope of the partnership business.²²

One of several partners does not, merely because of the partnership relation, have authority to direct or make an unlawful arrest so as to bind the firm,²³ or other partners,²⁴ who are not connected with the detention²⁵ or shown to have received any benefit therefrom,²⁶ or to have afterward ratified it.²⁷ However, if all the partners join in making or causing an unlawful arrest or detention all of them,²⁸ as well as the partnership,²⁹ may be held responsible.

§ 40(11). — Client and Attorney

A client is responsible for a wrongful detention by his attorney if the wrongful acts are within the scope of the attorney's authority, or if such acts are expressly authorized or ratified.

As discussed in Attorney and Client §§ 67, 68, the relation between a client and his attorney is that of principal and agent, liability of the former for the wrongful acts of the latter depending on the rules governing such relationship. However, before liability may be imposed on such basis the relationship of attorney and client must be shown to exist.³⁰

Nominal client

Nominal libelants in admiralty suit against carriers for damage to cargo consigned to nominal libelants sustained relation of clients to their attorney of record, so as to make nominal libelants liable for false imprisonment of witness against whom invalid body attachment was issued at attorney's request, notwithstanding nominal libelants had been reimbursed for damage to cargo by insurer and attorney was retained by insurer, where institution of suit in

Liability is, of course, imposed where the client instigates, advises, or directs the attorney to cause an unlawful detention.³¹ Where, however, the arrest is not made with the direct authority of the client, some cases have been decided on the theory that the scope of the attorney's authority is very broad and that he is invested with a liberal discretion and most ample power in everything pertaining to the matter in his hands,³² these cases indicating that the act of the attorney in arresting or causing the arrest of the party against whom the client has a claim is within the scope of the attorney's authority and if wrongful renders the client responsible.³³ Other cases, however, proceed on a narrower view of the scope of the attorney's authority, and hold that, where a client merely gives a claim to his attorney, the arrest of the debtor is not within the scope of his authority and the client is not responsible for a wrongful detention caused by him.³⁴

After a judgment has been obtained the great weight of authority is that the method of enforcing it is within the scope of the attorney's authority, and the client is accordingly responsible for an unlawful detention caused by him in enforcing it,³⁵ although the client did not specifically authorize the attorney's act,³⁶ or even know of the issuance of the process of arrest.³⁷

Ratification. The client may be held responsible also where, the arrest having been made for his benefit, he recognizes and ratifies the act of his attorney in causing it.³⁸

§ 41. Liability of Agent

- a. In general
- b. Attorneys

a. In General

The fact that an agent acts pursuant to authority from his principal does not excuse him from liability for a wrongful arrest.

An agent or employee who makes or causes an illegal arrest is not excused from liability because he acts pursuant to authority derived from his principal.³⁹

b. Attorneys

Ordinarily an attorney who procures, directs, or participates in an unlawful arrest or detention is liable therefor; this is not so as to an attorney who goes no further than advising that an arrest is justifiable and not participating therein.

If the circumstances are such that liability generally would be imposed because of procuring, directing, or participating in an unlawful arrest or detention, the attorney who procures, directs, or participates therein is liable⁴⁰ even though the juditheir name was pursuant to their obligations under policy.

cial officer issuing a void process or serving or executing it is immune,⁴¹ and his honesty of purpose does not protect him.⁴² There is only slight authority for the proposition that an attorney who in issuing process acts in good faith and with the honest purpose of protecting his client is not liable if the arrest turns out to be wrongful.⁴³

On the other hand, an attorney who goes no further than advising that the case is one justifying arrest, but who does not participate therein, is not liable if the arrest turns out to have been unlawful.⁴⁴ So an attorney merely urging the law in connection with a contempt proceeding which the court finally determines is not liable for a false imprisonment resulting from the court's error,⁴⁵ and although an arrest was under an irregular and void warrant an attorney who after the arrest appeared to prosecute the cause was exonerated, where he had not officially interfered in directing the arrest.⁴⁶

He incurs no liability where the arrest or detention is lawful, as, for instance, where he issues valid process and delivers it to the officer for service,⁴⁷ although it is subsequently altered without his direction or advice,⁴⁸ or where the process procured by him is merely erroneous and not void.⁴⁹

District attorneys. In accord with general rules discussed in District and Prosecuting Attorneys § 16, a district attorney is not liable for false imprisonment for having appeared in a prosecution in the course of his official duties;⁵⁰ but it has been stated that the mere fact that defendant is an assistant district attorney will not per se establish immunity, and relief may be granted plaintiff unless defendant acted lawfully with respect to plaintiff in participating in or causing his continued imprisonment.^{50.5}

§ 42. Superior Executive Officer and His Inferior or Deputy

- a. Liability of superior
- b. Liability of inferior or deputy

a. Liability of Superior

Generally, a superior officer is not responsible for a wrongful detention made by his inferior when the latter is not acting in his official capacity or by virtue of his office, unless he expressly authorizes, directs, or ratifies the action; but a superior officer is responsible for a wrongful detention made by his inferior when the latter is acting officially.

A superior officer is not liable for the alleged false arrest and false imprisonment committed by his subordinates in the absence of a showing that he took part in, commanded, or ratified the alleged trespass.^{50.50} Moreover, that an arresting or detaining officer is subject to the orders of his superior does not of itself render the latter liable for a wrongful arrest or detention,⁵¹ it being a general rule that a superior officer is not responsible for a wrongful arrest or detention made or caused by his inferior or deputy when not acting in his official capacity or by virtue of his office,⁵² although he is liable if he directed the wrongful acts to be done or gave express authority therefor,⁵³ or if he participated in⁵⁴ or ratified⁵⁵ it. The superior officer is not liable in the absence of liability on the part of the deputy.^{55.5}

On the other hand, a superior executive officer is responsible for a wrongful arrest or detention made or caused by his inferior or deputy when the latter is acting officially,⁵⁶ and this without regard to the superior's knowledge or participation therein.⁵⁷ Thus the superior is liable for the acts of his inferior where the inferior, acting under process, abuses it,⁵⁸ as, for instance, where a deputy, armed with a writ, arrests the wrong man by mistake,⁵⁹ and it has been held that a sheriff is liable for the act of his deputy in arresting a man under a void warrant.⁶⁰

The relation of a superior to, and his liability for the acts of, his inferior are analogous to the relations of a surety on the official bond to the officer

bonded.⁶¹

b. Liability of Inferior or Deputy

Ordinarily an inferior officer or deputy is personally liable for misconduct in making or causing a wrongful arrest, even though acting under the orders or directions of his superior.

An inferior officer or deputy is personally liable for any misconduct of which he may be guilty in making or causing a wrongful arrest or detention,⁶² that the arresting officer is acting under orders or directions of his superiors ordinarily being no defense;⁶³ and this is so where the illegality of the order arises from the fact that it is founded on an invalid law.⁶⁴ However, if the order to detain results in a detention which is not unlawful, no liability is incurred, although it has been suggested that the rule may be different if the power to arrest or detain cannot be delegated by the superior to the inferior.⁶⁵

Knowledge inferred

There being no rules or regulations of a sheriff's office attempting to limit a deputy's authority to make arrests without warrant, but it being the custom or habit of deputies to act without warrant on a telephone message from another sheriff to make an arrest, the law would, if necessary to hold the sheriff responsible for such an act of his deputy, infer knowledge of the sheriff that this would be done.

§ 43. Private Persons Assisting Officer

Under statutes authorizing peace officers to call on private persons to assist in making an arrest, such persons are usually protected against liability for a false imprisonment. Apart from such statutes such persons are protected if assisting an officer acting under a valid warrant, or under circumstances rendering the arrest lawful.

Under statutes authorizing peace officers to summon private persons to assist them in making an arrest, discussed in Arrest § 16 a, it is ordinarily held that the private person is not to be held liable where he obeys such a summons coming from a known peace officer,⁶⁷ without regard to whether or not the officer was acting under a warrant,⁶⁸ or whether, if acting under a warrant, such warrant was valid or invalid,⁶⁹ or whether, if acting without warrant, the arrest was legal or illegal.⁷⁰

Irrespective of such statutes, a person who assists one who is in fact a peace officer in the service of a warrant, which is not void, is not liable,⁷¹ and does not become so if the arrest, although lawful in the first instance, becomes a trespass ab initio by some subsequent misconduct of the officer.⁷² So, if an arrest without warrant is made under circumstances rendering it lawful, those summoned to aid the officer are equally protected with him.⁷³ It has been said that the person assisting the officer would not be liable in any event if he responded in good faith to the officer's summons and kept within his orders and directions,⁷⁴ at least where his acts are not wanton or beyond what he is required to do,^{74.5} or where he does not show malice or oppression against the person arrested.^{74.10}

However, it has been held that if the warrant is void the persons assisting are liable,⁷⁵ and that one who assists a police officer cannot justify the arrest, if the police officer himself acts without warrant and beyond the territorial limits within which he is authorized to act.⁷⁶

The principles protecting private persons acting at the summons of a known peace officer are not to be extended to cases where the one giving the summons is not in fact a public officer,⁷⁷ or only assumes to act in that particular case by special appointment,⁷⁸ or, it seems, where the officer is acting under civil process,⁷⁹ or where the private person assisting does so voluntarily and not because of the summons of the officer;⁸⁰ nor are such principles to be extended so as to protect a subordinate officer acting at the direction of his superior.⁸¹

§ 44. Judicial Officers

- a. Rules of no liability
- b. Distinction between judges of courts of general and of limited jurisdiction
- c. Effect of malice or corruptness
- d. Clear absence of all jurisdiction
- e. Ministerial acts
- f. Causing detention for contempt

a. Rules of No Liability

A judicial officer is generally not liable for a false arrest or detention arising out of his official acts amounting to an excessive or erroneous exercise of jurisdiction where there is no clear absence of all jurisdiction.

Based on the principle that all judicial officers are protected by their official character from liability in tort, because of public conduct clearly within the pale of their authority, although involving demonstrable legal error,⁸² discussed fully in Judges §§ 62, 63, it is the general rule that a judicial officer is not liable for a false arrest or detention arising out of acts done in his judicial capacity where there is not a clear absence of all jurisdiction over the subject matter and person, even though such acts constitute an excessive or erroneous exercise of jurisdiction or involve a decision that the officer had jurisdiction over the particular case where in fact he had none.⁸³ The rule is sometimes stated in somewhat different terms to the effect that a judicial officer is not liable when the arrest or detention is in a case belonging to a class over which he has cognizance, and is by complaint or other proceedings put at least colorably under his jurisdiction.⁸⁴

Erroneous exercise of jurisdiction. Once a judicial officer acquires jurisdiction, his subsequent acts are considered judicial for which he incurs no liability.⁸⁵ Accordingly if there is not a clear absence of all jurisdiction, and if the complaint or affidavit or other preliminary proceedings confer on him at least colorably the right to determine whether or not to act in the particular case, a judicial officer is not liable for his erroneous decision,⁸⁶

"It is a general principle of the highest importance to the proper administration of justice that a judicial officer, in exercising the authority vested in him, shall be free to act upon his own convictions, without apprehension of personal consequences to himself. Liability to answer to everyone who might feel himself aggrieved by the action of the judge would be inconsistent with the possession of this freedom and would destroy that independence without which no judiciary can be either respectable or useful."

"Immunity is not given by law to favor judges beyond other officials or merely to protect them from liability as individuals. Excess and absence of jurisdiction distinguished

(1) It is stated in a number of decisions that there is a clear distinction between absence of all jurisdiction as to the subject matter and excess of jurisdiction.

(2) By excess of jurisdiction, as distinguished from the entire absence of jurisdiction, is meant that the act, although within the general power of the judge, is not authorized with respect to the particular case, because the conditions which alone authorize the exercise of his general power in that particular case are wanting.

Justice of peace suspending sentence, and thereafter indorsing commitment on abstract of proceedings, causing plaintiff's arrest and imprisonment, was held not liable for false imprisonment on ground that justice had divested himself of jurisdiction and then proceeded to act.

although his decision involves an error of law,⁸⁷ or of fact.⁸⁸

The rule has been applied to cases where the magistrate decides erroneously that the act committed was a crime,⁸⁹ improperly construes a statute,⁹⁰ or erroneously decides that an ordinance, for the violation of which the arrest is ordered, is valid,⁹¹ or applies to the alleged offender.⁹²

In cases over which the judicial officer has general jurisdiction, complaints, affidavits, or other preliminary proceedings have been held sufficient to protect him in acting thereunder where on a reasonable construction thereof the charge of an offense justifying arrest can be gathered,⁹³ or where there is presented even in a slight degree a question on which the judicial mind is called to act in determining whether a crime has been committed by the person charged.⁹⁴

The protection extends to erroneous procedure,⁹⁵ and errors of judgment resulting in improper detention after arrest,⁹⁶ and to a second arrest on proof of the insufficiency of bail offered after the first arrest.⁹⁷

Mistake as to evidence. A mistake concerning the just weight and importance of evidence presented is merely an erroneous decision for which the judicial officer is not liable,⁹⁸ nor is he liable if he draws stronger inferences from the testimony than it warrants.⁹⁹

Exceeding powers. Where jurisdiction has been secured, the magistrate is not ordinarily liable, if in view of the situation he decides that he possesses greater power than he actually possesses.¹ For instance, the magistrate has been exonerated where, although he had authority to conduct only preliminary proceedings prior to trial, he erroneously decided that he had jurisdiction to try and convict² and, conversely, the magistrate has been exonerated where his duty was to try minor offenses immediately, and he erroneously decided to hold accused for trial by another court.³

Sentence. There is no liability on the part of the judicial officer for an excessive sentence, as the sentence is good only for the lawful time and the person detained would be entitled to a release at the end of the legal time.⁴ So the judge is not liable if in good faith he imposes a prison sentence without the alternative of a fine as required by the statute.⁵ Improper sentence as basis for liability is discussed infra subdivision d of this section.

b. Distinction between Judges of Courts of General and of Limited Jurisdiction

Generally the rules exempting judicial officers from liability for their official acts apply to judges of courts of limited jurisdiction as well as to judges of courts of general jurisdiction.

The rules as to exemption of judicial officers from liability for their official acts, while applied without exception to judges of courts of general jurisdiction,⁶ have not in all instances been applied "Based on the question of jurisdiction, it is generally held that judges of courts of general jurisdiction are immune from personal liability. The reason for this is that the jurisdiction of such courts extends to all matters which may arise to judges of inferior courts.⁷ However, the strong trend of authority has been to apply the same rules to judges of courts of general jurisdiction and to those of limited jurisdiction,⁸ such as justices of the peace,⁹ city magistrates,¹⁰ and other officers with special judicial functions,¹¹ when acting in a judicial capacity.¹²

A distinction may exist in the fact that a presumption exists in favor of a court of superior jurisdiction that such court has acted within its jurisdiction, unless the absence of all jurisdiction is shown,¹³ while such a presumption does not arise where the jurisdiction of the court is limited.¹⁴

Where there is a clear absence of all jurisdiction, the liability is the same as to both classes of officers,¹⁵ and honesty of purpose, while it may mitigate damages, cannot justify a clear usurpation of authority.¹⁶

c. Effect of Malice or Corruptness

Usually the rules of exemption of judicial officers for their official acts are not affected by the fact that they act maliciously or corruptly.

Where the circumstances are such that the judicial officer would otherwise be exempt from an action for false imprisonment, he is not, according to the weight of authority, liable, although he has acted maliciously or corruptly.¹⁷ This is particularly true with respect to judges of courts of general jurisdiction,¹⁸ and where the point has been squarely raised the same rule has been, in the majority of cases, applied to judges of courts of limited jurisdiction,¹⁹ although some decisions may be found stating that if an inferior judge acts maliciously or corruptly, even in a matter in which he otherwise would be exonerated, he incurs liability.²⁰ If, however, a judicial officer has no jurisdiction of the subject matter or person he is civilly liable for his malicious and corrupt acts.²¹

Conspiracy. It has been held that if a justice, together with others, wrongfully and maliciously conspired to have one arrested for the purpose of harassing him, he may be liable.²²

d. Clear Absence of All Jurisdiction

A judicial officer is liable for a false arrest or imprisonment when he acts in the clear absence of all jurisdiction.

If a judicial officer acts in the clear absence of all jurisdiction and authority he incurs liability for a false arrest or imprisonment caused by him,²³ and in court, and it is practically impossible for a question to be presented to the court with respect to which it does not have jurisdiction. This is not true, of course, of courts of limited jurisdiction, such as police courts, examining magistrates, justices of the peace, probate courts, and the like. Within the respective jurisdictions of such inferior courts, their judges are immune from personal liability, just as judges of courts of general jurisdiction are, but it is possible for a question to arise before the judges of such courts which is not within their jurisdiction. This necessarily follows from the fact that they are courts of limited jurisdiction."

Absence of basis for jurisdiction. The general rule is that a judicial officer who acts on a complaint or affidavit containing allegations having no legal value or color of legal value to give him jurisdiction over the offense incurs liability.²⁶ Some fact or circumstance must appear tending to establish the guilt of accused,²⁷ and complaints on mere hearsay or information and belief have been held insufficient to confer jurisdiction.²⁸ The general rule has been applied in some instances to cases where the complaint clearly sets forth no charge of the commission of a crime.²⁹

held liable where he issues a warrant unsupported by oath or affirmation³³ in violation of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution,³⁴ or of the constitutional or statutory provisions of the state respecting the issuance of warrants of arrest.³⁵

Where a judicial officer issues a warrant of arrest based on a void affidavit^{35.5} or where he issues a warrant on the application of a person not authorized by statute to apply for one,³⁶ he has been held liable.

Sentence. A judicial officer has been held liable for false imprisonment where he imposes a sentence unwarranted by law, as, for example, where he sentences and imprisons accused without a trial and conviction for the offense,³⁷ or where he imposes a prison sentence, when the statute authorizes only a fine,³⁸ or, contrary to the ordinance governing the case, sentences the offender to immediate imprisonment in default of the payment of a fine.³⁹

Unofficial capacity. A judicial officer participating in an unlawful arrest or detention in an unofficial capacity is liable therefor.⁴⁰

e. Ministerial Acts

Ordinarily the rule exempting judicial officers from liability for false imprisonment arising out of their official acts does not apply to purely ministerial acts.

The rule of exemption in favor of judicial officers does not apply to acts which are not judicial but purely ministerial in character.⁴¹ For a detention brought about by illegalities or irregularities in such duties they are liable in damages to the person arrested,⁴² and this is especially so where their acts are done with corrupt motives.⁴³

Although no distinct line of separation can be traced between ministerial and judicial action,⁴⁴ it has been said that the distinction between the two is that where the law prescribes and defines the duties to be performed with such precision and certainty as to leave nothing to the exercise of discretion or judgment, the act is ministerial, but where the act to be done involves the exercise of discretion or judgment, it is not to be deemed merely ministerial,⁴⁵ and that as safe a criterion as any other to ascertain whether a private suit would or would not lie is to adopt the rule which governs in cases in which a mandamus would or would not be granted,⁴⁶ as discussed in Mandamus § 72.

Although the magistrate's act in determining whether a warrant of arrest shall issue is judicial, it has been held that his act in making the warrant is ministerial,⁴⁷ and, as discussed supra subdivision d of this section, he is liable if he issues process void on its face. So also the act of issuing process of commitment⁴⁸ or of execution after final judgment has been treated as ministerial,⁴⁹ and it has been said that liability would arise if a judicial officer issued a commitment which was contrary to the statute,⁵⁰ or in violation of the rule of law that a commitment may never authorize a severer punishment than the judgment on which it is founded,⁵¹ or which was issued notwithstanding payment of the fine imposed by the judgment.⁵²

The act of approving or refusing to approve an appeal bond has also been held to be ministerial,⁵³ and liability has been imposed where detention resulted from wrongfully refusing to approve such a bond.⁵⁴

On the other hand, a judicial officer is not liable for his ministerial act in issuing process authorized by his judgment,⁵⁵ and where his act in issuing process at the request of a party is ministerial he has been exempted from liability,⁵⁶ provided he acted in good faith,⁵⁷ without knowledge that the issuance of the process was contrary to statutory provisions.⁵⁸

f. Causing Detention for Contempt

The rules governing the liability of a judicial officer for a wrongful detention based on an alleged contempt are the same as govern his liability for a wrongful detention based on other acts.

On principles similar to those already enumerated respecting the exemption of judicial officers from liability for their acts which cause the arrest or detention of another, such an officer is not liable for causing a detention for an alleged contempt when he has general jurisdiction over contempt, and of the person of the offender, and facts arise before him giving him power to decide whether the offense has been committed,⁵⁹ irrespective of his motive in causing the detention.⁶⁰ However, liability has been imposed where his authority to act depends on his compliance with statutory provisions, and he acts in disregard thereof,⁶¹ as, for instance, where the proceedings must be founded on a preliminary oath, and none is made,⁶² or where notice or hearing is required, and no notice of hearing was had.⁶³

Where the power to punish for contempt is confined to the court against which the contempt is committed, a judicial officer not acting as judge of that court may incur liability by ordering a detention for a contempt thereof.⁶⁴

Liability has also been imposed where the magistrate orders the imprisonment of the offender when he has power only to fine,⁶⁵ or where his power depends on the pendency of the action before him, and he causes an imprisonment after the termination of the action.⁶⁶

Nonjudicial officers. Since the power to punish for contempt is a judicial power, as discussed in Contempt § 43 a, a nonjudicial officer, such as the mayor of a city⁶⁷ or a notary,^{67.5} who attempts to exercise such power may be held liable.

ecute such an action or he may as a result of his own conduct be precluded from recovering damages for the unlawful detention,⁶⁸ as where he voluntarily remains in custody, even under a mistaken view of legal conclusions.⁶⁹ However, a waiver is not always spelled out of the conduct of a person who impliedly consents to his arrest or detention,⁷⁰ it even having been said that, since one cannot consent to an unlawful restraint such consent is no defense to an action for false imprisonment based on a clear restraint of liberty.⁷¹

A plaintiff, surrendered by his surety on his bail, will not be deemed to have consented to his unlawful detention, in the absence of proof that the surrender was procured by plaintiff for the purpose of laying the foundation for an action in false imprisonment.⁷²

a. In General

Various acts may or may not constitute a waiver, as for example, neglect or drunkenness prolonging a detention initially lawful.

Various matters have been urged and considered on the question whether the right of action for false imprisonment has been barred or waived,⁷⁴ as, for example, a plea of guilty considered infra subdivision b this section, and other matters considered in the succeeding subdivisions.

Conduct prolonging detention. A person, rightfully arrested, cannot complain of the continuance of a lawful detention occasioned by his own neglect,⁷⁵ or his incapacity on account of drunkenness or by his own conduct generally.⁷⁶

b. Plea of Guilty

A plea of guilty does not as a general rule waive the right of action for an illegal arrest.

As a general rule, the liability for an illegal arrest is not waived by plaintiff pleading guilty of the offense for which the arrest was made,⁷⁷ especially where the proceedings were a nullity because the court was without jurisdiction to act in the matter.^{77.5} Where, however, an arrest is not void ab initio, but merely illegal because of some irregularity, its illegality may be impliedly waived by a plea of guilty.⁷⁸ So, where a plea of guilty constitutes an admission of facts authorizing an arrest without a warrant, it may amount to a bar.⁷⁹

c. Inducing Arrest or Detention

A person causing, provoking, or inducing his own arrest or detention has no cause of action for a false imprisonment.

Where a person is instrumental in causing or provoking his own arrest or detention, no liability attaches,⁸⁰ as where a warrant, alleged to be illegal, was placed in the hands of an officer at the request of the person against whom it was issued.⁸¹ So one cannot maintain an action for false imprisonment who by his own conduct or statements induces his arrest under a process not naming him correctly⁸² or which is not intended to describe him.⁸³

d. Defects in Process

Defects or irregularities in process or preliminary proceedings rendering them merely voidable are waived by a voluntary appearance and plea; this is not true as to defects going to the jurisdiction of the court.

Where a judicial officer possesses jurisdiction both of the crime and of the person of plaintiff, any defect or irregularity in the warrant or preliminary deposition is waived by voluntary appearance and plea,⁸⁴ but defects relating to the jurisdiction of the court are not so waived,⁸⁵ nor, it seems, are defects of such a substantial nature that they render the process void.⁸⁶ So, where an arrest is on civil process which is irregular but not void, such irregularities are waived by defendant, where he appears and gives bail without moving to be discharged.⁸⁷

An action for false imprisonment cannot be based on defects in mesne process which are due to the failure of the person arrested to make timely objection where he has had an opportunity to do so in the proceedings prior to its issuance.⁸⁸

e. Delay or Failure to Arraign or Bring before Magistrate

An arrested person may by agreement or conduct waive a delay or failure to bring him before an appropriate officer.

One arrested may excuse a delay in arraignment or in bringing him before the magistrate or other proper officer by express agreement⁸⁹ or by his

One may be illegally arrested and charged with having committed a misdemeanor, and, rather than defend the charge, the accused may plead guilty, and pay the fine imposed, and go about his business. It may be a very serious inconvenience to the person arrested, especially if he is away from home, to go through a trial, although he may feel certain of his innocence. He therefore pleads guilty, and submits to the imposition of a fine. The fact can, however, not palliate or atone for the serious wrong an officer may have committed in making an unlawful arrest, and of illegally depriving the citizen of his liberty."

conduct.⁹⁰ So one may be precluded from basing an action of false imprisonment on the fact that he was not brought before the proper magistrate or other judicial officer by his own conduct in securing his release,⁹¹ or his consent to his release without arraignment,⁹² although the mere fact that plaintiff accepted his discharge without insisting on being brought before the magistrate does not, according to all authorities, constitute a waiver.⁹³

If a person under arrest desires to be taken before some magistrate other than the one nearest and most accessible, and the officer complies with such request, neither he nor one who advises him in so doing can be held liable for false imprisonment.⁹⁴

Under some statutes if a party voluntarily asks to be freed from an arrest without arraignment, and his discharge follows, he waives any claim for damages which otherwise he might have had against the officer.⁹⁵

V. ACTIONS

§ 47. Nature and Form

At common law the form of action for recovery of damages for false imprisonment is trespass, or trespass to the person vi et armis, but under statute case may lie, and, where forms of action have been abolished or modified by code or practice acts, the form of action becomes immaterial, even though substantive distinctions remain.

The form of action under which damages for false imprisonment are recoverable at common law, and under statutes declaratory thereof,⁹⁶ is trespass, or trespass to the person vi et armis.⁹⁷ It is neither trespass quare clausum fregit for injury to property,⁹⁸ nor trespass on the case,⁹⁹ except as trespass on the case may be authorized by statute.¹ An action for false arrest is a personal action,^{1,5} in the nature of a trespass for a direct wrong or illegal act.^{1,10} A suit against a sheriff and his official sureties for false imprisonment is in trespass and not in assumpsit.²

Although the substantive distinctions remain,³ the form of action has become unimportant in many jurisdictions which have modified or abolished forms of action under codes and special practice acts.⁴

In the Philippine Islands civil damages for the tort of false imprisonment were recoverable in a prosecution for the crime of false imprisonment.⁵

ordinarily be laid in the county in which the cause of action arose or in which defendant resides. The action is transitory in character and suit may be brought in one state for a false imprisonment occurring in another state.

An action for false imprisonment must be brought in a court of competent jurisdiction.⁶ The action is transitory and not local,⁷ and the courts of one state will entertain an action for a false imprisonment occurring in another.⁸

Venue. In accordance with local constitutional and statutory requirements, the action may generally be brought in the county in which the cause arose⁹ or in which defendant resides.¹⁰ Where the tort is continuous and parts of it occur in two or more counties, the action may be brought in any one of them.¹¹ Under an express statutory provision a common carrier may be sued in any county in which the wrong occurred.¹²

§ 49. Time to Sue and Limitations

A right of action for false imprisonment accrues at the beginning of the imprisonment but does not become complete until the termination thereof, and the action must be brought before the expiration of the time limited by statute. Under some statutes notice of the action is a condition precedent.

The right of action for false imprisonment accrues at the beginning of the imprisonment but does not become complete until the termination thereof,¹³ the tort being regarded as divisible.¹⁴ Although there is authority to the contrary,¹⁵ it has been generally held that the action may lie irrespective of the termination of the suit or prosecution in which the false imprisonment occurred.¹⁶

Statutory notice. Where statutory provisions require notice of an action for false imprisonment, the giving of such notice in a case governed by the statute is a condition precedent to bringing the action,¹⁷ as in the case of actions for false imprisonment against legislative¹⁸ or judicial¹⁹ officers, and the form and indorsement of such notices should comply with statutory requirements.²⁰ It has been held that the right to notice is contingent on the good faith of the public officer.²¹

Meaning of "jurisdiction"

The term "jurisdiction," as used in cases relating to false arrest or imprisonment, includes not merely jurisdiction of the general subject matter to which cases of the character involved may belong, but also jurisdiction of the person and jurisdiction to enter the particular judgment in the particular case.

Irregular or voidable writ

(1) Where writ or process under which one is arrested is irregular, but not absolutely void, a false imprisonment action will not lie until it is set aside but when it is set aside, it ceases to be a protection for acts done while it was in force.

- Mich.—Dallas v. Garras, 10 N.W.2d 897, 306 Mich. 313.

(2) Where plaintiff was arrested and imprisoned under a writ voidable for failure to comply with statutory requirements, it was held that an action for false imprisonment could not lie before the writ was quashed.

- N.H.—Blanchard v. Goss, 2 N.H. 491.

Void process

Where body execution was void, action for false imprisonment was not "premature," notwithstanding action was instituted prior to plaintiff's release from jail under habeas corpus.

imprisonment begun after the prescribed period,²³ even if the proceedings in which the arrest took place are continued within the prescribed time.²⁴ Where the action, although described under another name, is in effect an action for false imprisonment, it is barred by the statute if the acts alleged occurred beyond the prescribed period.^{24.5}

Where two statutes of limitation are applicable to the facts, the action is governed by a statute specifically applying to false imprisonment in preference to a statute applying generally to a class of persons within which defendant is included,²⁵ or one applying to another offense connected with the false imprisonment.²⁶ In determining which of the two statutes of limitation is applicable to the facts alleged, the court will look at the nature of the action.^{26.5}

A statute fixing a particular limitation period for actions for false imprisonment may be impliedly repealed by a later statute fixing a different period for actions for injuries to the person.²⁷

Under statutes barring actions for false imprisonment begun more than a specified time after the accrual of the cause of action, the limitations begin to run from the termination of the imprisonment.²⁸ The action for false imprisonment is to be regarded as begun at the time of filing the original declaration, notwithstanding an amended complaint amplifying the charge is later filed,²⁹ or under a saving statute, a second action is begun after dismissal of the first "otherwise than upon the merits."³⁰

§ 50. Parties

Persons jointly suffering a false imprisonment may join as parties plaintiff, and those jointly committing a false imprisonment may be joined as parties defendant. A superior officer is not a necessary party defendant to an action against his subordinate for a false imprisonment committed by the subordinate while acting beyond the scope of his official duties.

An action for false arrest does not give rise to a cause of action in any one other than the person directly aggrieved,^{30.50} although, under a survival statute, a personal representative may bring the action.^{30.55}

Where the allegations show that two or more persons were falsely imprisoned in connection with the same transaction and that the counts for each

26.5 Abuse of process, not false arrest

A complaint, alleging that defendant corporation caused filing of criminal complaint against plaintiff in a Kansas justice of the peace court for felony of drawing bank check on insufficient funds for part of plaintiff's debt to such defendant and issuance of warrant, on which plaintiff was arrested and required to give bond, for improper purpose of attempting to force him to pay debt after its discharge in bankruptcy, sought recovery for abuse of process, not false arrest, and hence was not barred by Kansas one year statute of limitations governing actions for false arrest.

An action for false imprisonment may be brought against two or more defendants jointly,³² and plaintiff may elect to proceed against them jointly on a liability several as well as joint.³³ If an officer is acting within the scope of his official duties, his surety on the bond, his superior officer, and the surety of the latter are proper and necessary parties defendant;^{33.5} but where an officer acting beyond the scope of his official duties falsely imprisons a person, his superior officer is not a necessary party defendant to a suit against the inferior officer for false imprisonment.³⁴ In a libel action by an alien seaman for false imprisonment against a foreign navigation company and its local agent, the agent is not a proper party defendant where he has no managerial control or ownership of the vessel.^{34.5}

§ 51. Declaration, Complaint, or Petition

- a. In general
- b. Allegations as to particular matters

a. In General

The complaint in an action for false imprisonment should state the facts constituting the essential elements of the cause of action, and the presence or absence of allegations sufficient to show a malicious prosecution will not affect its sufficiency. Matters of defense need not be negated by the plaintiff.

General rules of pleading ordinarily apply in actions for false imprisonment.³⁵

The declaration, complaint, or petition must, in accordance with common-law rules³⁶ or the requirements of the codes and practice acts,³⁷ contain an allegation of the facts constituting the essential elements of the cause of action.³⁸ Facts as distin-

Statements of fact

(1) An allegation that an imprisonment was "without any warrant" was plainly an allegation of fact, meaning that the arrest and imprisonment were without process, and properly pleaded the unlawful character of the imprisonment.

Mo.—Burton v. Drennan, 58 S.W.2d 740, 332 Mo. 512.

(2) Allegations that the arrest was "without warrant of law or any lawful process," "forcibly and against the will of plaintiff," and "without reasonable or probable cause" are averments of ultimate fact.

(3) Other averments see 25 C.J. p 530 note 62 [a].

Conclusions

(1) If a plaintiff had merely alleged that his imprisonment was unlawful or illegal, there would have been ground for claiming that he had improperly alleged conclusions instead of facts.

Mo.—Corpus Juris cited in Burton v. Drennan, 58 S.W.2d 740, 741, 332 Mo. 512.

(2) An allegation that plaintiff was lodged in jail without any right or authority and against his will and consent is but a conclusion.

Idaho.—Jones v. Green, 168 P.2d 834, 66 Idaho 731.

(3) Allegations that defendants "wickedly conspired together to cause" plaintiff to be unlawfully arrested and imprisoned without any just cause and that they urged court to hold plaintiff in contempt and order him imprisoned were mere conclusions.

Concise statement of facts sufficient

In action for unlawful arrest and false imprisonment, brought under an act abolishing distinctions between trespass and trespass on the case, plaintiff's statement of claim need only be concise statement of facts on which he seeks to recover.

Violation of motor vehicle law by defendant

In suit against magistrate and police officer for alleged illegal arrest and imprisonment for violation of state statute prohibiting running of motor vehicle on highways without state license or license number plate, allegation in petition that one of defendants violated such law was irrelevant, and was properly stricken on demurrer.

44.5 Only affecting recovery

(1) An allegation in petition of harsh and humiliating treatment accorded relator while in custody of state highway patrolmen, who allegedly struck and beat him to obtain confession, if found to be true, would not affect character of action as one for false imprisonment, or convert it into one for assault and battery, but would merely add to amount of damages which jury might fix, in their discretion, as fair compensation for the false imprisonment.

Mo.—State ex rel. Patterson v. Collins, App., 172 S.W.2d 284.

(2) In action for false arrest and imprisonment growing out of plaintiff's ejection from passenger train, allegation that officers had beaten and assaulted plaintiff was not an independent ground of complaint, but was merely to be considered as having been pleaded in aggravation of damages resulting from alleged false arrest and imprisonment.

or have been held to state a cause of action other than for false imprisonment.^{44,25}

Negating defenses. Plaintiff is not bound to anticipate and negative all of the facts which may constitute a defense to his cause of action,⁴⁵ and, if matters in justification of an alleged illegal arrest exist, they must be affirmatively shown by defendant, as considered infra § 52, and not negated by plaintiff in his complaint.⁴⁶

Cure by answer. Allegations in the answer may cure an omission of an averment from the complaint.⁴⁷

Allegations as to malicious prosecution. The mere fact that the complaint contains allegations which would support an action for malicious prosecution will not render it fatally defective as a complaint for false imprisonment where it contains averments of a character sufficient to sustain it as such,⁴⁸ particularly where only a general demurrer is interposed;⁴⁹ and the fact that a count in a complaint is bad as one for malicious prosecution will not necessarily render it defective as one for false imprisonment.⁵⁰

- (1) Detention; venue
- (2) Unlawful character of detention
- (3) Defendant's responsibility for unlawful detention
- (4) Malice and want of probable cause
- (5) Damages

(1) Detention; Venue

The complaint for false imprisonment should allege a detention of the plaintiff, but the cause for, or the duration of, his detention need not be averred. An informal allegation of venue may be sufficient.

In an action for false imprisonment a complaint which fails to allege any actual restraint is fatally defective,⁵¹ but, if the facts alleged sufficiently show that plaintiff was in some manner actually detained or restrained, the complaint will be sufficient,⁵² even though there is no averment that plain-

Allegations as surplusage

Where it is apparent from the face of a complaint that it was the purpose of the pleader to state a case of false imprisonment, surplusage allegation, usually found in actions for malicious prosecution, not necessary to a statement of the cause of action, will be disregarded.

Cal.—Monk v. Ehret, 219 P. 452, 192 C. 186.

Informalities

Where an informal pleading in a district court charged an unlawful arrest without a warrant and also an arrest with a warrant, the first should be construed as a count for false imprisonment and the second as one for malicious prosecution, as against the contention that the action was only for malicious prosecution.

Detention for search

Allegations that defendant accused plaintiff of stealing money from defendant's automobile and demanded that plaintiff be searched and that the manner of defendant's actions and tone of his voice made it clear that there would be serious trouble if plaintiff did not allow himself to be searched, and that plaintiff therefore permitted himself to be detained against his wishes and to be searched, stated cause of action for false imprisonment.

tiff made any physical effort to escape.^{52.5}

Allegations as to arrest and imprisonment. A mere allegation of wrongful arrest without allegation of detention or damage has been held demurrable,⁵³ but other authority holds that an allegation of illegal arrest is sufficient without an allegation of imprisonment, since such an arrest is both technically and factually an imprisonment or restraint.⁵⁴

Involuntary character of detention. It is not necessary that the declaration specifically allege that the imprisonment was against the will of plaintiff, where from the facts alleged it sufficiently appears that such was the case,⁵⁵ and it has been held that such an averment may be supplied by amendment at the close of the evidence.⁵⁶

Cause for detention. It is not necessary for the complaint to disclose the offense, if any, charged against a plaintiff who is alleged to have been falsely imprisoned.⁵⁷

The duration of the imprisonment need not be alleged.⁵⁸

Venue. An informal allegation of venue may be sufficient.⁵⁹

(2) Unlawful Character of Detention

In an action for false imprisonment the complaint must allege that the restraint was unlawful.

As a general rule a plaintiff in an action for false imprisonment must aver that the detention or imprisonment was wrongful or unlawful, or the facts and circumstances showing the unlawfulness thereof,⁶⁰ and, where it affirmatively appears from the face of the complaint that the restraint of plaintiff was lawful, no cause of action for false imprisonment is stated.⁶¹ Where the facts alleged do

Proper arrest as disorderly person

Under statute defining "disorderly persons," complaint charging that plaintiff was arrested by city officer without warrant after spending night in uninhabited house, and committed by city magistrate to city jail for few hours and to county jail for five days for observation, stated no cause of action for false arrest against arresting officer, magistrate, or city.

Smoking on street car

A petition did not state cause of action for false imprisonment against street railroad whose officers detained plaintiff for smoking on street car, on theory that there was no state or municipal law prohibiting smoking on street car, where plaintiff nowhere alleged or inferred that such conduct was not in violation of a rule promulgated by street railroad for protection of its passengers and business, or that, if there were such rule, it was void for unreasonableness.

Ga.—Hughes v. Georgia Power Co., 15 S.E.2d 466, 65 Ga.App. 163.

Justice retaining jurisdiction to arrest

Charge that justice of peace indefinitely suspended sentence was in effect allegation that sentence was suspended for maximum term, so that justice causing plaintiff's arrest within such maximum term had not divested himself of jurisdiction and not show that the acts complained of were unlawful or wrongful, it has been held that they are not shown to be so by a mere allegation that they are wrongful and unlawful,⁶² but there is also authority to the contrary.^{62.5}

The declaration, complaint, or petition, in order to be sufficient, must allege facts which negative any presumption of legality of the arrest,^{62.10} such as that the arrest was made without a warrant or legal process,^{62.15} that he had not committed a public offense in the presence of the arresting officers,^{62.20} that the arresting officer had no reasonable grounds for believing that a felony had been committed,^{62.25} that he did not commit the acts with which he was charged and that such acts did not constitute a crime,^{62.30} or that there was an unnecessary delay in bringing plaintiff before a magistrate.^{62.35}

On the other hand, where the facts alleged show the unlawfulness of the imprisonment, the complaint may be sustained,⁶³ and, if such facts raise a

Invalidity of warrant on face

In action for false imprisonment, complaint alleging that plaintiff was arrested under warrant charging offense for which he had previously served sentence on plea of guilty was insufficient to state cause of action against police officers executing warrant, in absence of allegation that warrant, was not valid on its face, notwithstanding allegation that imprisonment was unlawful and void.
